TRANSLATOR'S PREFACE

THIS translation of my friend Deissmann's Licht vom Osten has been made from the second edition (curiously called "second and third") of the German work (Tübingen, 1909). The genesis of the book, which was first published in May, 1908, is described in the author's Preface; its success may be judged from the shortness of the time that elapsed before a second edition was required. Arrangements for the English translation were completed before the book was three months old, and a preliminary advertisement appeared in the Athenaeum as early as October 10, 1908. It is not the fault of the publishers that the English version is ready a year later than was expected. There was a miscalculation to begin with, and the work of translation proceeded more slowly than had been estimated. Well, "a man's reach should exceed his grasp, Or what's a heaven for?" The delay has brought compensations. The English reader now has the book in its revised and enlarged form, including nine illustrations that were not in the first edition (Figs. 22, 23, 25, 29, 41, 42, 43, 49, 50). These facsimiles have their value not only for the learned, who (by taking pains: see p. 362, n. 1) can spell out most of the old writing, but also for the unlearned. Everybody can gain from them, as the author says (p. 147), some idea of the inimitable individuality of each single papyrus letter. "That autograph Letter, it was once all luminous as a burning beacon, every word of it a live coal, in its time; it was once a piece of the general fire and light of Human Life, that Letter! Neither is it yet entirely extinct: well read, there is still in it light enough to exhibit its own self; nay to diffuse a faint authentic twilight some distance round it. Heaped embers which in the daylight looked black, may still look red in the utter darkness. These Letters . . . will convince any man that the Past did exist! By degrees the combined small twilights may produce a kind of general feeble twilight, rendering the Past credible, the Ghosts of the Past in some glimpses of them visible!"¹

The printing of the second German edition began while the author was in the East, and by his desire I saw the work through the press. His return relieved me of responsibility, but my duties as proof-reader remained unaltered, so that for several months the whole of my leisure time was devoted to this work. My translation came to a standstill, but I acquired particular acquaintance with the original.

"Light from the East" would have been the title of the book, literally translated, but as that had already been appropriated for the Rev. C. J. Ball's work on the archaeology of the Old Testament (1899), a distinguishing adjective had to be inserted. Geographically the title refers to the Levant or, to use the author's own word, "Anatolia." As used in this book, Anatolia does not mean Asia Minor alone, still less a definite Turkish province in its western portion. The term includes, as the reader will quickly discover, Asia Minor, Syria, Palestine, Egypt, in fact the whole of the Eastern Mediterranean lands, with the islands.

The whole of this English version has been read in proof by the author, and I have had the great advantage of consulting him in writing on a very large number of points, of various importance, at every stage of the printing. The amount of correspondence involved has been considerable, but such trouble always brings its own reward. In certain details this book is more correct than the latest German edition. For example, the author has deleted a false reference to

Moschion for the word περισσεία (p. 80). Instances of the author's special additions are : p. 55, n. 4 (the whole) ; p. 332, n. 4 (last sentence) ; p. 333, n. 2 (the whole) ; p. 341, n. 1 (last sentence). I have suppressed on my own responsibility a mistaken allusion to English crossed cheques on p. 337. One slight omission is unintentional, and may be here rectified : at p. 278, n. 2, the words "at Didyma" ought to be inserted after "next day" in the third line. All errors detected in the German have of course been corrected (e.g., p. 332, n. 2, Buresch's reading, given as Παυδίσχη, is in fact Παδίσχη ; p. 367, n. 3, line 5, now rightly reads Trajan instead of Hadrian). In some few places the German has undergone silent adaptation for English readers. The changes are quite unimportant, and generally obvious (e.g., the measurements in feet and inches instead of the metric system, the sums of money expressed in English currency, and the reference to Bradshaw and the Post Office Directory). The allusion to the liturgy of the Church of England on p. 361 is perhaps less easily recognisable as an instance of the same kind.

In other cases, where simple adaptation was impossible, I have added an explanatory footnote. These and all other additions for which the author must not be held responsible are marked (Tr.). Where possible I have supplied references to English translations of the works cited, but I am aware that more might be accomplished in this direction. Schürer's Jewish People in the Time of Jesus Christ, for example, is accessible in English.

I should have liked very much to find an English parallel to the example at p. 220, n. 1, of a writer's saying that his letter has grown into an epistle, but my search hitherto has been unsuccessful. The fact is that the words letter and epistle have been so long used synonymously in English (at first seriously, and now half humorously) that it requires a little effort to adapt oneself to Deissmann's technical use of these terms (pp. 147, n. 1 ; 220 ff.). The English parallel I seek will be found in some nineteenth-century writer, I think, if it is discovered at all, for epistle is used as the exact equivalent of letter from the time of James Howell (author of the Epistolae Ho-Eliaanae, 1645) down to Robert Burns.

If at times the notes which I have added evince a liberal conception of relevancy, it must be pleaded that to a person like myself, representing the general reader rather than the theologian, there were many temptations to indulge the annotating habit. How delightful it was, for instance, at p. 23 to recognise in Dr. C. René Gregory the man who in 1883 made Ruskin¹ "feel like Sardanapalus and Ahasuerus and the Caliph Haroun Alraschid and George the 4th and the Count of Monte Cristo—and Dives and Cræsus and Gorgius Midas," the man whose hard work and good writing are praised in Fors Clavigera (Letter 94), and who correctly dated Ruskin's MS. of the Septuagint² 1463 instead of tenth century as the owner had thought it to be. The mysterious Nysa in Arabia Felix (p. 134 f.) has found its way, in another connexion, into English poetry, for Wordsworth's description of " the chosen spot

In Nysa's isle, the embellished grot, Whither, by care of Libyan Jove (High servant of paternal Love), Young Bacchus was conveyed,"³ was suggested by a later passage in Diodorus. Surprising, after the lapse of centuries, was the parallelism between the language of Antonis Longus—"that I may do obeisance to [or kiss] thy hand" (p. 169)—and the courtly phraseology in England in the time of Charles I. Sir John Suckling, for instance, wrote in a letter to a nobleman (c. 1632), "If these few lines shall have the happiness to kiss your hand, they can assure you . . ." A still closer parallel occurs in the letter of the poet Dryden to his cousin Honor (23 May, 1655): "That I may one day again have the happiness to kiss your fair hand ; but that is a message I would not so willingly do by letter as by word of mouth." Dryden again seems to come near anticipating some points of this book (pp. 224-234) when he writes¹ thus of the early churches and the apostles' care for them :

"For all their wants they wisely did provide,
And preaching by epistles was supplied :
So great physicians cannot all attend,
But some they visit, and to some they send.
Yet all those letters were not writ to all,
Nor first intended, but occasional,
Their absent sermons."

In other particulars, apart from the notes, I have constantly tried to make the English reader's version of this book more useful, if possible, than the original, thus doing my best to support the publishers in their manifest resolve to improve upon the German edition as regards externals. When it came, therefore, to what Thomas Fuller called "the bag and baggage of a book," the Indices, I had no hesitation in preparing them on the same elaborate scale as the author himself adopted. The Indices may still be regarded as of the author's own design, but some changes have been made. References are now given as exactly as possible, not by the page only, but also by the number of the footnote, and this number is often to be taken as a finger-post to a certain part of the text as well as to the remark at the foot of the page. I first made this improvement in the second German edition, where it was even more necessary on account of the large size of the page. In Index II. I have now, in accordance with English usage, included the names of immortals, which in the German edition must be sought for in the Subject Index. For the rest the Subject Index preserves the idiosyncrasies of the original. Reference is facilitated by placing a good many compound entries under two letters of the alphabet. Thus "Arm of God," which is indexed only under A in the German, can now be found either in this form or in the form "God, Arm of." The German Index, though so extremely minute, was sometimes more terrifying than helpful. On looking up such a word as Alexandria, Berlin, Jesus, or Paul, one was confronted with a column of figures, half an inch to three inches in length, representing perhaps more than fifty references, but with not a single clue to the maze. In the English Index something has been done to improve this.

In the translations of the Greek texts I was naturally guided by the German, but I did not feel called upon to follow it literally. Even the translations of papyrus letters by Grenfell and Hunt, which are of course made directly from the Greek, and which in some cases have already attained popular celebrity, did not seem to be the right thing for me to use, though I have carefully considered them. There is a modern ring about them¹ which separates them off from the diction of the English Bible, and so would have weakened the comparison which it is a main object of this book to make between the sacred and profane memorials of Hellenistic Greek. I therefore have tried to render the Greek literally in language as far as possible resembling that of the Authorised Version and the Revised Version. If the word before me occurs in the Greek Bible my principle is to adopt by preference one of the renderings of King James's translators. It is hoped that in this way the kinship of these texts with the style and language of the Bible may be made more conspicuous, and that even a reader who neglects the Greek may be struck by the frequent Biblical echoes. The result may leave something to be desired as regards clearness, but is it right in translating an ancient letter to give it a perspicuity which the original does not possess? And that ancient letters are not always perspicuous any person acquainted only with English may see for himself if he will trouble to look at even a modernised edition of the fifteenth-century Paston Letters.

This subject is, I think, sufficiently important to be illustrated by a comparison. Take these two renderings of a "Saying" in the second Logia fragment from Oxyrhynchus :—

Jesus saith : Let him that seeketh . . . not cease . . . until he findeth, and when he findeth he shall be amazed, and having been amazed he shall reign, and having reigned he shall rest.

Jesus saith : Let not him who seeks . . . cease until he finds, and when he finds he shall be astonished ; astonished he shall reach the kingdom, and having reached the kingdom he shall rest.

The first is as printed at p. 437 below, the second is by Grenfell and Hunt. The forms seeketh, findeth, him that are preferred to seeks, finds, him who as being more archaic and Biblical. The Greek word θαμβέω is translated amaze in Mark i. 27, x. 32, astonish in Mark x. 24, Acts ix. 6 ; the R.V. uses amaze in each place, except in Acts ix. 6, where the word disappears from the text. So also βασιλεύω is translated reign in Matt. ii. 22, Rom. v. 14, 17, 21, vi. 12, 1 Cor. iv. 8 (A.V. and R.V.). Note that and has dropped out before the second astonished. It is unnecessary to give further details, but I suppose there is not one of the translated texts but contains at least one instance of specially chosen wording on these principles.

I have promised the author to give here my reasons for declining to follow his practice of trying to indicate in the translations those portions which represent a restored original. That practice is unnecessary and inexact. Lacunae and restorations must of course be indicated as accurately as possible in the printed Greek text. The scholar interested in these things naturally looks at the Greek and finds there what he wants. Those who are not scholars, those in fact for whom the translations are provided in the first place, take no interest in such minutiae. They can see in a general way from the facsimile, or from the printed Greek text, that the original is much or little mutilated, and they expect the translation to inform them of the final results of criticism applied to the text. Now take an example. Had I followed the author's practice I should have written at p. 169 :—

- . . . if the g[o]ds will. Salute Capit[o mu]ch and [my] brother and sis-20 [t]er and Se[reni]lla and [my] friend[s].
 I sent the[e by] Euctemon a little [pi]cture of me.
 Moreov[e]r [my] name is Antonis Maximus. Fare thee well, I pray.
 Centuri[a] Athenonica.
 25 There saluteth thee Serenus the son of Agathus [Da]jemon, [and r and Turbo the son of Gallonius and . [. . .] . . . [. . .] . . . [. . .]

With all this trouble I should have succeeded in giving only an imitation, not a representation of the actual condition of the papyrus. A certain number of facts are correctly conveyed: 18 words are defective in the Greek, and 18 words are distinguished by brackets in the English; 35 letters have been restored in the Greek, and 35 letters are bracketed in about the same relative positions in the English lines; 10 of the English words correspond exactly with the Greek in meaning and in position in the line, and thus 22 of the restored letters may be said to be successfully denoted in the English. In the 8 remaining words (involving 13 letters) the right position in the line is attained only by bracketing letters in the wrong word. Thus an altogether wrong impression is created in the reader who pays no attention to the Greek. He may think, for instance, that the words my (three times) and by have been supplied wholly by conjecture. By really is bracketed solely because it occurs at that place in the line where in the original the Greek word for picture stands minus its first two letters. This important word, picture, which perhaps does deserve to be marked as conjectural in an English rendering of the letter, gets its brackets merely by accident—because in the English order of words it occupies the place of the word translated "of me." The German word-order is more elastic, and German employs more inflections than English, so that it is easier on the whole to carry out this imitative process in German than in English, but even then great care is necessary to make the imitation successful. It so happens that in the above passage the German is in some respects less accurate than the English in its use of brackets. The German has only 17 words with brackets (there should be 18); 40 letters are bracketed (there should be only 35); 14 words (with 28 letters) may be pronounced successfully imitated. Of the 4 unsuccessful cases two may be due to oversight, and two seem caused by thinking more of the words and the sense than of the single letters.

By discarding this artificial system of brackets the translations gain in simplicity for non-specialist readers, and it becomes possible in case of need (e.g. in Letter 16, p. 196 f.) to use brackets to denote words that have to be supplied in order to complete the sense in English.

As a rule I have not retained in the translations the original division into lines, which Deissmann endeavours faithfully to preserve. There would be practical use in this, if it could be done, but even with the flexible word-order of German only an approximation can be obtained. In English the approximation would have been less satisfactory, and as the pieces are mostly short it will usually be possible to refer from the translation to the original or vice versâ without much trouble, even though the lines of the translation are now run on. At any rate the reader is no worse off than when using Grenfell and Hunt's translations. Those editors also neglect the division into lines; they distinguish none of the minutiae of restoration, and do not even print their English side by side with the Greek. In one text of exceptional length quoted in this book (p. 254 ff.) the division into lines has been maintained, roughly of course, in order to facilitate reference to the Greek.

A word must be said concerning the abbreviations. There are really remarkably few of them in the book. "I.G." occurs at p. 13, n. 1, but is explained at p. 11, n. 1. A small numeral above the line after the name of a book (thus: *Sylloge*²) indicates the edition. A special monstrosity of this kind occurs at p. 336, n. 2, where Kommentar, 8/9^{8.7} denotes the eighth edition of vol. 8, and the seventh edition of vol. 9, which are bound up together. At p. 216, n. 3, the symbol || means "parallel with." The other abbreviations, I hope, will explain themselves.

In the German edition the diacritical marks employed in the Greek texts receive as a rule no explanation. I think, however, there may be many readers able to appreciate such things who are nevertheless not quite certain of their precise signification. The following list is based on Grenfell and Hunt's introductory note to the Amherst Papyri:—

Round brackets () indicate the extension of an abbreviation, the resolution of a ligature or symbol, e.g. pp. 152 f., 158, 160 f.

Angular brackets < > indicate that the letters enclosed in them were omitted (i.e. not written) in the original, e.g. pp. 149, 154, 162, 191. (In the translation on p. 254 they indicate a word which, though actually written in the Greek, should be omitted.)

Double square brackets [[]] indicate that the letters enclosed in them were deleted in the original. See p. 151, n. 4.

Dots within brackets indicate the approximate number of letters missing, e.g. pp. 123, 137, 168.

Dots outside brackets indicate mutilated or otherwise illegible letters, e.g. pp. 123, 168.

Dots under letters indicate a probable but not certain reading, e.g. pp. 123, 151, 162, 174, 176, 191.

Dashes under letters indicate an almost certain reading, e.g. pp. 162, 168, 172 f., 176, 191. In the text given on p. 415 f. the dots and dashes are now for the first time used in conformity with the usual practice, observed elsewhere throughout the book. In both German editions, unfortunately, though no attention was called to the fact, the functions of dot and dash were by an oversight reversed in this text.

A dash above a letter indicates a contraction, e.g. p. 204, lines 14 ($\acute{\alpha}\mu\alpha\rho\tau\acute{\iota}\eta = \acute{\alpha}\mu\alpha\rho\tau\acute{\iota}\eta\nu$), 24, 28, p. 415 f. Sometimes it means that the letter is used as a numeral, e.g. pp. 164, 186, 188. The mysterious ξ on p. 176, line 23, is perhaps a numeral (= 5).

An oblique stroke / indicates (p. 102, n. 2) the point where a new line begins in the original.

At the end of November last Mr. H. I. Bell, of the British Museum (Department of MSS.), kindly gave me information, in answer to an inquiry, which would have enabled me to make improvements on p. 47, but by a misunderstanding pp. 33-176 were printed off without being submitted to me in revise. "Christian town of Menas" (p. 47, n. 2) is misleading, since Menas was a saint, and it was only in course of time that something like a town grew up around the sanctuary connected with his tomb, which was a resort of pilgrims. The Third Report referred to has been published (Dritter Bericht über die Ausgrabung der Menas-Heiligtümer in der Mareotiswüste, vorgelegt von C. M. Kaufmann, Cairo, 1908), and contains some account of the ostraca, with photographs. They were published by E. Drerup, "Griechische Ostraka von den Menas-Heiligtümern," Römische Quartalschrift, 1908, pp. 240-247. Drerup is inclined to place the ostraca in the sixth rather than the fifth century, but Mr. Bell thinks they cannot well be later than the early sixth century.

In the last chapter, where the author speaks of the future problems of Greek lexicography, I ought to have mentioned in a note that a "Lexicon of Patristic Greek" is now in preparation in England. The idea originated with the Central Society of Sacred Study, and its Warden, Dr. Swete, Regius Professor of Divinity at Cambridge. Since the death of Dr. H. A. Redpath (September, 1908) the Rev. Herbert Moore, Vicar of Acton, Nantwich, has acted as receiver of the materials collected by voluntary readers from the Greek Fathers down to A.D. 500. If sufficient helpers¹ come forward the period may be extended to A.D. 750.

Dr. Milligan's Selections from the Greek Papyri, referred to in the note on p. 21 as in preparation, appeared at the end of February, 1910.

Nothing remains now but the pleasant duty of thanking several kind helpers. The author himself is the person whom I have troubled most, and to whom I am most indebted. My grateful acknowledgments are also due to Mr. H. I. Bell, for the information mentioned above; to my friend the Rev. W. H. Hayman, Rector of Leckford, Hants, under whose hospitable roof some of the first proofs were corrected, for his opinion in certain Hebrew matters; to my friend Mr. F. W. Henkel, B.A., F.R.A.S., for making a preliminary translation of the Appendices; to my colleague Professor Gradenwitz for help with the word προαποδότης (p. 327, n. 4); and to Miss C. E. Strachan, B.A., my sister, who read the proofs as far as p. 184, and afterwards looked up all sorts of little points for me at the British Museum. The proof-reading, I may say, was made as easy and pleasant a task as possible by the printers, Messrs. Hazell, Watson & Viney, of Aylesbury, and their reader, Mr. W. H. Bridges, who sent out the proofs in really beautiful condition. I was the better able to appreciate this because in the smudgy proofs which I was obliged to read for the second German edition one was often in doubt whether the accents were there or not, the distinction between full-stop and comma was often unrecognisable, and the sheets sometimes came back from correction looking worse than they did before. To Mr. Bridges I am indebted for much more than the technical excellence of the proofs. His queries were always valuable, and as an instance of his interest in the book I may mention that he called my attention to the letter in the Times mentioned at p. 280, n. 1, which I also discovered for myself independently a few hours before his information arrived. I shall never know exactly how much of the excellence in the proofs was due to his vigilant eye and how much to the good workmanship of the compositors. About thirty of them were employed on the book, it seems, and their English names were pleasant to read on the MS. that came back to me in a foreign town, and my thoughts often ran gratefully to those men of Aylesbury.

The few errors that I have observed to be still in need of correction are all of my making :—

PREFACE TO THE SECOND EDITION

I WAS in the midst of preparations for a second Anatolian journey when I heard from Dr. Paul Siebeck, about Christmas, 1908, that the first edition was nearly exhausted. I was able, however, before my departure, to revise the book, making improvements and additions to fit it for its new public appearance. Many readers will welcome the considerable increase in the number of illustrations. I am indebted to many friends and colleagues who have corrected me and added to my knowledge by letter or in reviews. Numerous instances of this indebtedness will be found in the notes. . . .

My second journey, begun on 24 February and safely ended on 6 May, 1909, was undertaken with financial assistance from the Prussian Ministry of Education. I travelled with my friends Carl Schmidt, Wilhelm Weber, and one younger companion. Our route led us viâ Constantinople to Asia Minor (Eski Shehr, Angora, Konieh and environs, Afium-Kara-Hissar, [Ala-shehr Philadelphia, Sardis,] Smyrna, Ephesus, Laodicea, Hierapolis, Mersina, Pompeiopolis, Tarsus), Syria (Alexandretta, Antioch on the Orontes, Beyrout, Baalbec, Damascus), Galilee (Tiberias, Tell Hum Capernaum and environs, Nazareth), Haifa with Carmel, Samaria, Judaea (Jerusalem, Bethlehem, Jericho, Dead Sea, Jordan, Jaffa), and Lower Egypt (Port Said, Cairo and environs, Alexandria). This long itinerary will gain in distinctness if I say, speaking in terms of the New Testament, that I was privileged to see the homes of St. Paul and the Saviour Himself, and the principal roads traversed by them, so far as these scenes of New Testament story were not yet known to me from my first journey.

Looking back on the second journey, which took me also for a brief space into the homeland of the papyri and ostraca of which use is made in this book, I consider it an advantage that I did not see Palestine until after I had seen Asia Minor and Syria. The great uniformity of the culture of the Mediterranean lands was thus brought home to me more clearly, and I think also that I was thus better prepared to realise the peculiar characteristics of Palestine. I consider it equally important that Jerusalem should be entered from the north, by the high-road from Galilee. That is the historical road to the Holy City, the pilgrims' way. Thus Jesus as a boy of twelve, thus St. Paul as a young man, and thus the Crusaders advanced to conquer the city, and this ought still to be the only approach to Jerusalem.

Only thus was it that Jerusalem became to me in many respects the climax of the whole expedition. The mass of pathetic facts and problems connected with a unique past, the motley commotion in the social and religious present, where, however, vigorous types of ancient piety have kept alive to this day—in all this the multitude of single observations accumulated on the journey united to form one great general impression of the essential character and value of the religious East, which is a unity amidst all the confusion of tongues and all the play of colours in the costumes.

Of course it has not been possible for me yet to work up these observations. For that I must have time. But when I think of all that I have learnt (I trust) for the better understanding of the gospels, the letters of St. Paul, the Acts of the Apostles, and the Revelation of St. John, I cannot but express my gratitude to the Ministry of Education for enabling me to undertake this journey. I wish that right many of my fellow-students might be given the same opportunity of beholding with their own eyes the scenes of gospel and Primitive Christian history. The New Testament is the most important monument of the East that we possess; those who study it have therefore a claim upon the East.

ADOLF DEISSMANN.

PREFACE TO THE FIRST EDITION

“LIGHT from the East”—it is a curious title for the book, but before you censure it just look for a moment at the Eastern sunshine. On the castled height of Pergamum observe the wondrous light bathing the marble of Hellenistic temples at noon-day. At Hagios Elias in Thera look with hushed rapture upon the golden shimmer of the same light over the endless expanse of the Mediterranean, and then in the vino santo of the hospitable monks divine the glow of that same sun. Mark what tones this light has at command even within stone walls, when at Ephesus a patch of deep blue sky gleams through the roof of a ruinous mosque upon an ancient column now mated to a fig-tree. Nay, let but a single beam of the Eastern sun peep through a chink of the door into the darkness of a poor Panagia chapel: a dawning begins, a sparkling and quickening; the one beam seems to wax twofold, tenfold; day breaks, you take in the pious meaning of the wall frescoes and the inscribed words, and the miserable poverty that built the shrine is forgotten.

Make that sunbeam your own and take it with you to the scene of your labours on the other side of the Alps. If you have ancient texts to decipher, the sunbeam will bring stone and potsherd to speech. If you have sculptures of the Mediterranean world to scrutinise, the sunbeam will put life into them for you—men, horses, giants, and all. And if you have been found worthy to study the sacred Scriptures, the sunbeam will reanimate the apostles and evangelists, will bring out with greater distinctness the august figure of the Redeemer from the East, Him whom the Church is bound to reverence and to obey.

And then, if you speak of the East, you cannot help yourself: made happy by its marvels, thankful for its gifts, you must speak of the light of the East.

After fifteen years spent in studying the Greek Bible and other secular documents of the Hellenistic East, it was a matter of extreme moment to me to be privileged in the spring months of 1906 to take part in an expedition, assisted by a grant from the Baden Ministry of Education, for study purposes to Vienna, Buda Pesth, Bucharest, Constantinople, Asia Minor, Greece with the principal islands, and Southern Italy. The tour was organised and conducted in masterly fashion by Friedrich von Duhn. In the great museums and at the centres where international excavations are in progress we had not only him to instruct us, but the foremost authorities in archaeology and epigraphy—Austrians, Hungarians, Roumanians, Turks, our own German countrymen, Greeks, Englishmen, Frenchmen, and Italians—rendered us the greatest assistance in our studies. We were indebted most particularly to Wilhelm Dörpfeld and my old schoolfellow Theodor Wiegand. For me personally the whole expedition was hallowed with peculiar, unforgettable solemnity owing to a deeply affecting family bereavement, the sudden news of which reached me at Smyrna. Thus it dwells in my memory now as a great event to which I owe both widening and deepening of experience.

On my arrival home I began to write a book, combining my impressions of the tour with observations I had already made in the course of my studies. The foundation was provided by a course of lectures¹ which I gave at the Hochstift, Frankfort on the Main, in 1905, and which appeared afterwards in English, first in serial² and then in book form.³ I was also able to make use of smaller articles of mine, most of which appeared in Die Christliche Welt, some being reprinted with my permission in the eighth volume of Ernst Lohmann's journal, Sonnen-Aufgang: Mitteilungen aus dem Orient (1906).

The linguistic details in Chapter II. of the present book are to some extent supplemented in my Cambridge lectures,⁴ one of which is devoted to Septuagint philology. Of the new and great tasks which the new texts set before the Septuagint scholar I have spoken but occasionally in the present book; but nearly all the observations that I have brought together on the New Testament could be carried further back and applied in like manner to the Greek Old Testament.

At the desire of my publisher, Dr. Paul Siebeck, who displayed great and intelligent interest in the whole field of my researches, I have written the main text of the book (as distinct from the foot-notes) in a manner to be understood in all essentials by the general reader without specialist knowledge. For the same reason the Greek and Latin texts have been furnished with translations—a good means, by the way, of enabling the author to check his impressions. Dr. Siebeck complied most willingly with my suggestion that a large number of the more important texts should be shown in facsimile. In obtaining the necessary photographs, rubbings, etc., I was assisted by several scholars and publishers at home and abroad, and with especial liberality by the Directors of the Royal Museums (Berlin), the Imperial Postal Museum (Berlin), the Epigraphical Commission of the Royal Prussian Academy of Sciences, Lord Amherst of Hackney, the Heidelberg University Library, the Egypt Exploration Fund (London), the British Museum, and the Imperial Austrian Archaeological Institute. For all this aid I return respectful thanks.

From the beginning I was accompanied in my work by the practical sympathy of my friend Ulrich Wilcken, who was also one of those who helped by reading the proofs. The extent of my indebtedness to this pioneer worker in classical antiquities cannot be gauged from the mere quotations in the book itself. . . .

Little did I dream in October last (1907), when the book began to be printed, that its completion would mark my farewell to the University of Heidelberg. Even after my summons to another sphere of work I should have preferred to be able to publish it in my capacity as a Heidelberg Professor, for it is a Heidelberg book. But that summons caused the printing to be delayed some weeks. If I am thus unable to write Heidelberg after my name on the title-page, I must at least in this place acknowledge what help and stimulus, what true fellowship and friendship Heidelberg has brought me. I regard it as a most kindly dispensation of Providence that for more than ten years I have been privileged to live, work, and learn in this ancient University—and for just those ten years in which, while one's own aims become gradually clearer, one is still independent and receptive enough to be moulded by the most various kinds of men and institutions.

CHAPTER I

THE PROBLEM—DISCOVERY AND NATURE OF THE NEW TEXTS

1. THE gospel was first preached beneath an Anatolian sky. Jesus and Paul were sons of the East. The "Amen" of our daily prayers, the "Hosanna" and "Hallelujah" of our anthems, names such as "Christ" and "Evangelist" remind us constantly of the beginnings of our religious communion. Like other words distinctive of our faith, they are of Semitic and Greek origin. They take us back not only to the soil of Galilee and Judaea but to the international highways of the Greek or rather Graecised Orient: Jesus preaches in His Aramaic mother tongue, Paul in the cosmopolitan Greek of the Roman Empire.

So too the book which preserves an echo of the message of Jesus and His apostles: the New Testament is a gift from the East. We are accustomed to read it under a Northern sky, and though it is by origin an Eastern book, it is so essentially a book of humanity that we comprehend its spirit even in the countries of the West and North. But details here and there, and the historical setting, would be better understood by a son of the East, especially a contemporary of the evangelists and apostles, than by us. Even to-day the traveller who follows the footsteps of the apostle Paul from Corinth past the ruins of Ephesus to Antioch and Jerusalem, finds much revealed to him in the sunshine of the Levant which he would not necessarily have seen at Heidelberg or Cambridge.

In our acts of worship we have, thank God, nothing to do with the historical setting of the sacred text. The great outlines of the shining golden letters are clearly visible even in the semi-darkness of the shrine, and here our business is with things holy, not historical.

But theology, as an historical science, has a vital interest in the discovery of the historical setting, the historical background.

The ancient world, in the widest sense of that term, forms the historical background to Primitive Christianity. It is that great civilised world fringing the Mediterranean which at the period of the new religious departure displayed a more than outward compactness so far as the Hellenisation and Romanisation¹ of the East and the Orientalisation of the West had worked together for unity.

Any attempt to reconstruct this mighty background to the transformation scene in the world's religion will base itself principally on the literatures of that age,—and on earlier literatures in so far as they were forces vital enough to have influenced men's minds in the Imperial period. There are two groups of literary memorials deserving of special attention: firstly, the remains of Jewish tradition contained in the Mishna, the Talmuds, and kindred texts; secondly, the Graeco-Roman authors of the Imperial age.

Of neither of these groups, however, shall I speak

here, although I am not unaware of the great importance of this body of literary evidence. It were indeed a task well worthy of a scholar to devote his life to producing a new edition of Johann Jakob Wetstein's New Testament.¹ That splendid book is now a century and a half old, and its copious collection of parallels from Jewish and Graeco-Roman literature could be supplemented from our present stores of scientific antiquarian lore: it was one of the dreams of my student days. But on the whole ancient Jewish literature at the present time is being explored by so many theologians, both Jewish and Christian,—the Christian with fewer prejudices than formerly, and the Jewish more methodically,—and on the whole the Graeco-Roman literature of the Imperial period has attracted so many industrious workers, that we are already familiar with a wide extent of the literary background of Primitive Christianity. Indeed, the literary memorials are valued so highly that in some quarters it is consciously or unconsciously believed that the literature of the Imperial period will enable us to restore the historical background of Primitive Christianity in its entirety.

Those who think so forget that the literature, even if we now possessed the whole of it, is after all only a fragment of the ancient world, though an important fragment. They forget that a reconstruction of the ancient world is bound to be imperfect if founded solely on the literary texts, and that comparisons between Primitive Christianity and this world restored in fragments made up of fragments might easily prove erroneous. Even so brilliant and learned a scholar as Eduard Norden,¹ in criticising Primitive Christianity in its linguistic and literary aspects, insisted upon contrasts between St. Paul and the ancient world which in reality are mere contrasts between artless non-literary prose and the artistic prose of literature. Such contrasts are quite unconnected with the opposition in which Primitive Christianity stood to the ancient world.

As an attempt to fill in some gaps in the historical background of Primitive Christianity, and as an antidote to extreme views concerning the value of the literary memorials, the following pages are offered to the reader. I propose to show the importance of the non-literary written memorials of the Roman Empire in the period which led up to and witnessed the rise and early development of Christianity, the period, let us say, from Alexander to Diocletian or Constantine. They consist of innumerable texts on stone, metal, wax, papyrus, wood, or earthenware, now made accessible to us by archaeological discovery and research. The discoveries belong chiefly to the nineteenth century, which we might almost describe as the century of epigraphical archaeology²; but their importance for the historical understanding of Primitive Christianity is still far from being generally recognised, and it will be much longer before they are fully exhausted.

² General readers as well as specialists will appreciate the review of the century's work (restricted, however, to the archaeology of art) in Adolf Michaelis, Die archäologischen Entdeckungen des neunzehnten Jahrhunderts, Leipzig, 1906; 2nd ed. 1908, under the title Ein Jahrhundert kunstarchäologischer Entdeckungen. [Now accessible to English readers in translation, A Century of Archaeological Discoveries, London (J. Murray), 1908. TR.]

How different it has been with the cuneiform inscriptions of the East and their application to Old Testament study! Men who knew much about the Bible, but nothing of cuneiform, entered into competition with noisy and gifted cuneiform scholars, to whom the Bible had not revealed its mysteries, and an immense literature informed the world of the gradual rise of the edifice behind the scaffolding amid the dust and din of the Babylonian building-plot. It was spoken of in the wardrooms of our men-of-war and in the crowded debating halls of the trade unions.

It cannot be said that New Testament scholarship has hitherto profited on the same scale by the new discoveries. The relics of antiquity found in Mediterranean lands are able to throw light on the New Testament, but their value is not so obvious as that of the cuneiform inscriptions for the Old Testament, and can certainly not be made clear to every layman in a few minutes. No tablets have yet been found to enable us to date exactly the years of office of the Procurators Felix and Festus or of the Proconsul Gallio, which would settle an important problem of early Christian history, and Christian inscriptions and papyri of the very earliest period are at present altogether wanting. And yet the discoveries made by our diggers of archaeological treasure in Greece, Asia Minor, Syria, and Egypt are of very great importance indeed for the light they throw on the earliest stages of Christianity.

It is not merely that the systematic study of the new texts increases the amount of authentic first-hand evidence relating to the Imperial period. The point is that the literary memorials are supplemented by an entirely new group, with quite a new bearing on history.

In the literary memorials, what we have is practically the evidence of the upper, cultivated class about itself. The lower class is seldom allowed to speak, and where it does come to the front—in the comedies, for instance—it stands before us for the most part in the light thrown upon it from above. The old Jewish literature, it is true, has preserved along with its superabundance of learned dogma much that belongs to the people—the Rabbinic texts are a mine of information to the folklorist—yet it may be said of the Graeco-Roman literature of the Imperial age that it is on the whole the reflection of the dominant class, possessed of power and culture; and this upper class has been almost always taken as identical with the whole ancient world of the Imperial age. Compared with Primitive Christianity, advancing like the under-current of a lava stream with irresistible force from its source in the East, this upper stratum appears cold, exhausted, lifeless. Senility, the feature common to upper classes everywhere, was held to be the characteristic of the whole age which witnessed the new departure in religion, and thus we have the origin of the gloomy picture that people are still fond of drawing as soon as they attempt to sketch for us the background of Christianity in its early days.

This fatal generalisation involves of course a great mistake. The upper class has been simply confused with the whole body of society, or, to employ another expression, Primitive Christianity has been compared with an incommensurable quantity. By its social structure Primitive Christianity points unequivocally to the lower and middle class.¹ Its connexions with the upper class are very scanty at the outset. Jesus of Nazareth was a carpenter, Paul of Tarsus a weaver of tent-cloth, and St. Paul's words² about the origin of his churches in the lower classes of the great towns form one of the most important testimonies, historically speaking, that Primitive Christianity gives of itself. Primitive Christianity is another instance of the truth taught us with each return of springtime, that the sap rises upward from below. Primitive Christianity stood to the upper class in natural opposition, not so much because it was Christianity, but because it was a movement of the lower classes. The only comparison possible, therefore, is that between the Christians and the corresponding class among the pagans.

Until recently the men of this class were almost entirely lost to the historian. Now, however, thanks to the discovery of their own authentic records, they have suddenly risen again from the rubbish mounds of the ancient cities, little market towns, and villages. They plead so insistently to be heard that there is nothing for it but to yield them calm and dispassionate audience. The chief and most general value of the non-literary written memorials of the Roman Empire, I think, is this: They help us to correct the picture of the ancient world which we have formed by viewing it, hitherto, exclusively from above. They place us in the midst of that class in which we have to think of the apostle Paul and the early Christians gathering recruits. This statement, however, must not be pressed. Of course among the inscriptions and papyri of that time there are many that do not come from the lower class but owe their origin to Caesars, generals, statesmen, municipalities, and rich people.¹ But side by side with these texts lies evidence of the middle and lower classes, in countless depositions made by themselves, and in most cases recognisable at once as such by their contents or the peculiarity of their language. These are records of the people's speech, records of the insignificant affairs of insignificant persons. Peasants and artisans, soldiers and slaves and mothers speak to us of their cares and labours. The unknown and the forgotten, for whom there was no room in the pages of the annals, troop into the lofty halls of our museums, and in the libraries, folio on folio, are ranged the precious editions of the new texts.

In several ways these texts yield a respectable harvest to the student of the New Testament. I am not thinking now of the additions to our store of New Testament and other early Christian MSS. by the discovery of early Christian papyrus fragments, although in this direct way the value of the new documents is considerable. I am thinking rather of the indirect value which the non-Christian, non-literary texts possess for the student of Primitive Christianity. This is of three kinds:

(1) They teach us to put a right estimate philologically upon the New Testament and, with it, Primitive Christianity.

(2) They point to the right literary appreciation of the New Testament.

(3) They give us important information on points in the history of religion and culture, helping us to understand both the contact and the contrast between Primitive Christianity and the ancient world.

For the purposes of this work I have tacitly excluded one group of memorials. I shall in the main deal only with Greek and Latin texts and neglect those in other languages. I could not claim to speak as a specialist with regard to all of them, and moreover the sheer bulk of the Greek and Latin texts makes it necessary to fix bounds somewhere. I desire, however, to call special attention to at least one group, of the utmost importance particularly in the history of religion. The Semitic inscriptions, found in such numbers in the province of Syria and the border-lands to the East and North, enable us to reconstruct at least fragments of almost unknown heathen cults that were practised in the original home of Christianity.¹

2. It will be our business to discuss the new texts in the light of linguistic, literary, and religious history; but before we address ourselves to this triple task it is necessary that the texts themselves should be briefly described.¹

We divide them according to the material on which they are written into three main groups. This method of division is mechanical, but is recommended by the simple fact that the texts are generally published in separate editions according to the material they are written on. We shall speak in turn of:

- (a) Inscriptions on stone, metal, etc.,
- (b) Texts on papyrus,
- (c) Texts on potsherds.

(a) The bulk of the INSCRIPTIONS² are on stone, but to these must be added inscriptions cast and engraved in bronze or scratched on tablets of lead or gold, a few wax tablets, the scribblings (graffiti) found on walls, and the texts on coins and medals. These inscriptions, of which there are hundreds of thousands, are discovered on the site of the ancient civilised settlements of the Graeco-Roman world, in its fullest extent from the Rhine to the upper course of the Nile, and from the Euphrates to Britain. Inscriptions have been noted and studied since the days of the Renaissance,³ and in the eighteenth century there was one scholar, Johann Walch,⁴ who pressed Greek inscriptions into the service of New Testament exegesis. But the nineteenth century is the first that really deserves to be called the age of epigraphy.

Two names stand forth before all others as personifying epigraphical studies: August Böckh will always be associated with the Corpus Inscriptionum Graecarum, and Theodor Mommsen with the Corpus Inscriptionum Latinarum. The great collection of Greek inscriptions has long ceased to be up to date, and is gradually being replaced by newer publications,¹ but it was this first great attempt to collect all the material that alone enabled Greek epigraphy to develop so brilliantly as it has done. Great societies as well as independent archaeologists have added to the total number of inscriptions known by carrying on systematic excavations, typical examples being the work of the Germans at Olympia and of the French at Delphi. New Testament scholars will follow with interested eyes the discoveries made in recent years by the English and Austrians on the site of ancient Ephesus,² by British

Among the inscriptions there is one (No. 40), no doubt the remains of an inscription for a door, which is of interest in connexion with Acts xviii. 4: [συνα]γωγῇ Ἑβρ[αίων], "Synagogue of the Hebrews." I reproduce it here from a rubbing taken by me at the Corinth Museum, 12 May 1906 (Figure 1). The inscription is 18½ inches long; the letters are from 2¼ to 3½ inches high. The writing reminds one somewhat of the Jewish inscription in the theatre at Miletus, published in Appendix IV. of the present work. Baron Hiller von Gaertringen very kindly gave me his opinion (in letters dated Berlin, 14 January and 26 February, 1907) that the mason copied exactly the written characters that were set before him; as extreme limits within which the inscription must have been made the dates 100 B.C. and 200 A.D. might, with some reservation, be assumed.—It is therefore a possibility seriously to be reckoned with that we have here the inscription to the door of the Corinthian synagogue mentioned in Acts xviii. 4, in which St. Paul first preached! The miserable appearance of the inscription, which is without ornament of any kind, is typical of the social position of the

There are moreover plenty of native Greek archaeologists whose excellent work vies with that of their foreign visitors.

We await with most lively expectations the Greek volumes of the new Corpus of the inscriptions of Asia Minor, Tituli Asiae Minoris, now preparing at Vienna after important preliminary expeditions by the Austrian archaeologists¹ in search of new material. A large portion of the background of St. Paul's missions and the life of the primitive Christian churches will here be made accessible to us. Biblical philologists are provided with a mine of information in Wilhelm Dittenberger's splendid Orientis Graeci Inscriptiones Selectae,² a comprehensive work distinguished by the accuracy of its texts and the people whom St. Paul had before him in that synagogue, many of whom certainly were included among the Corinthian Christians that he afterwards described in 1 Cor. i. 26-31.—The Corinthian inscription bears also on the interpretation of the expression συναγωγή Αἰβρέων which is found in an inscription at Rome (Schürer, Geschichte des jüdischen Volkes III.³ p. 46; Schiele, The American Journal of Theology, 1905, p. 290 ff.). I do not think that Ἑβραῖοι means Hebrew-speaking Jews.—Further reports of the American excavations at Corinth are given in the American Journal of Archaeology, 2nd Series, Vol. 8 (1904) p. 433 ff., 9 (1905) p. 44 ff., 10 (1906) p. 17 ff.

I have already mentioned the study of St. Matthew by Walch, who, so far as I know, was the first to employ Greek inscriptions in the elucidation of the New Testament. Since then⁷ his followers in this path have been chiefly British⁸ scholars, e.g. Bishop Lightfoot and Edwin Hatch in many of their writings; E. L. Hicks,⁹ who has been already mentioned as one of the editors of the inscriptions of Cos and of the British Museum inscriptions; and most particularly Sir William Ramsay—who has himself done great things for the epigraphy of Asia Minor—in a long series of well-known works. In Germany in recent years E. Schürer is pre-eminent as having, in his great classical work on the history of the Jewish people and elsewhere, made the happiest and most profitable use of the inscriptions, while their importance has not escaped the learning of Theodor Zahn, Georg Heinrici,¹ Adolf Harnack, and others. Paul Wilhelm Schmiedel, in his excellent adaptation of Winer's Grammar,² has drawn most freely on the inscriptions in dealing with the accident. They have been turned to account for the philology of the Septuagint by Heinrich Anz,³ but most particularly by the author of the first Septuagint Grammar, Robert Helbing⁴; also by Jean Psichari⁵ and Richard Meister.⁶ Heinrich Reinhold,⁷ following Anz, compared the inscriptions with the Greek of the Apostolic Fathers and the New Testament Apocrypha. In my "Bible Studies"⁸ an attempt was made to show what they will yield for the purposes of early Christian lexicography, and the like has been done by H. A. A.

Epigraphy yields a rich harvest in Theodor Nägeli's study of the language of St. Paul,⁴ in the Grammar of New Testament Greek by Friedrich Blass,⁵ and still richer in that by James Hope Moulton.⁶ New Testament lexicographers have made but occasional use of the inscriptions, and Hermann Cremer, when he does so, is at times absolutely misleading in consequence of his peculiar dogmatic attitude on the subject. The additions which were made, chiefly by Adolf Schlatter, to Cremer's last edition of his *Biblico-Theological Lexicon of New Testament Greek*⁷ afford illustrations, in some important points, of the knowledge which the lexicographer in particular may gain from the inscriptions. Of the Christian inscriptions⁴ and their direct value to the scientific study of early Christianity I have not to speak; but I wish at least to say that in one direction they promise a greater harvest than many people might expect, viz. with respect to the history of the text of Scripture and its use. Already with the materials at present known to us quite a large work could be written on the text of Scripture as illustrated by Biblical quotations in ancient Christian (and Jewish) inscriptions.⁵ It is to be hoped that the Corpus of Greek Christian inscriptions now planned in France will not only put an end to the shameful neglect¹ with which epigraphists have treated these memorials, but will also help towards the completion of this task.

There is one circumstance which sometimes makes the inscriptions less productive than might have been expected, especially those that are more or less of the official kind. The style has often been polished up, and then they are formal, artificial, cold as the marble that bears them, and stiff as the characters incised upon the unyielding stone.² As a whole the inscriptions are not so fresh and natural as the papyri, and this second group, of which we are now to speak, is therefore, linguistically³ at any rate, the most important.

(b) The PAPYRI. One of the most important writing materials used by the ancients was the papyrus sheet.⁴ It takes its name from the papyrus

Schmidt, Erfurt, who wrote to me⁵ as follows: “Cyperus papyrus has proved its suitability as a rapid-growing decorative plant for large sheets of water, aquariums, etc. In the open air it thrives here only in summer, and only in a warm, sheltered position. It is propagated from seed or from leaf-shoots; the latter are cut down to about half their length and put in water.” A. Wiedemann⁶ gives the following description of the plant: “A marsh plant, growing in shallow water; root creeping, nearly as thick as a man’s arm, with numerous root-fibres running downwards; several smooth, straight, triangular stalks, 10 to 18 feet high, containing a moist pith (whence the Hebrew name, from gāmā, ‘to drink,’ ‘to sip up,’ and the phrase bibula papyrus in Lucan IV. 136), and surmounted by an involucre with brush-like plumes.”

The use of papyrus as a writing material goes back to extreme antiquity. The oldest written papyrus known to be in existence is, according to Kenyon,⁷ an account-sheet belonging to the reign of the Egyptian king Assa, which is conjecturally dated circa 2600 B.C.⁸ From these remote times until well on in the Mohammedan occupation of Egypt papyrus remains the standard writing material of that marvellous country, so that the history of its use in antiquity can be proved to extend over a period of about 3,500 years. Brittle and perishable as it appears on a superficial view, it is in reality as indestructible as the Pyramids and the obelisks. The splendid resistant qualities of the papyrus on which they wrote have helped not a little to make the ancient Egyptians live again in the present age.

The preparation of this material has been often wrongly described. It is not correct to say, as Gregory¹ does, that it was made from the "bast" of the plant. The process of manufacture was described for us by Pliny the Elder,² and to make his account still more intelligible existing papyri have been examined by specialists. Kenyon³ accordingly puts the matter thus:—"The pith of the stem was cut into thin strips, which were laid side by side perpendicularly, in length and number sufficient to form a sheet. Upon these another layer of strips was laid horizontally. The two layers were then gummed together with some adhesive material, of which Nile water was one of the ingredients. The resulting sheet was pressed, sun-dried, and made smooth by polishing, after which it was ready for use.

The manufacture of papyrus sheets goes on in much the same way even at the present day. In the autumn of 1902 my friend Professor Adalbert Merx¹ met a lady in Sicily who had learnt the art from her father and apparently still practised it occasionally. It was probably the same lady that was referred to in the following account of "Modern Syracusan Papyri" in a German newspaper² :—

"No visitor to Sicily who goes to Syracuse ever fails to take a walk along the shore, in the shade of a trim-kept avenue of pretty trees, to the Fountain of Arethusa. Here, transformed into a bubbling spring, the daughter of Nereus and Doris continues her deathless existence, and one likes to make her acquaintance in her watery element. But there is another attraction for the traveller besides the nymph, viz. the papyrus plants growing by the spring. The papyrus flourishes not only here, but also in great abundance in the valley of the Anapo near Syracuse. At the end of the 18th[?]³ century the plant which has done such service to learning was introduced at Syracuse from Alexandria and even employed industrially. In the course of centuries, however, it seems that the plantations in the Anapo valley ran waste, until at last a learned society at Naples requested the Italian Government to take proper steps for the preservation of the plant. The Government thereupon instituted an inquiry and commissioned the Syracuse Chamber of Commerce to report on the subject. From a translation of this report in the Papierzeitung it appears that a citizen of Syracuse, Francesco Saverio Landolina, began in the 18th century to manufacture papyrus exactly according to the directions given by the Roman scientist Pliny in the 13th Book of his Natural History. After Landolina's death the brothers Politi continued the manufacture, and were followed by their sons, and to-day there are only two persons in Syracuse, viz. Madame de Haro and Professor G. Naro, descendants of the Politi family, who know and practise the art of making papyrus. They receive annually, with the consent of the Ministry for Education, 400 bundles of the plant, which they work up themselves, without assistance. They use for their work a wooden mallet made according to Pliny's directions. The product is by no means so fine, close-grained, and white as the ancient papyri. The 200 sheets produced every year measure $9\frac{4}{5} \times 7\frac{4}{5}$ inches each. Two bundles of the plant are required to make one of these sheets. The papyrus sheets are sold exclusively to tourists. Those with pictures of Syracusan architecture painted on them are the most popular. A German resident at Syracuse sticks these pictures on postcards and sells them to strangers. A sheet of papyrus costs from $1\frac{1}{2}$ to 2 lire, and those with pictures are dearer."

It is interesting to note that a project has been put forward more than once lately to revive the manufacture of papyrus and make it a Government monopoly with a view to its employment as a material for banknotes that should defy imitation.

The size of the single sheet of papyrus was not constant in ancient times, and there ought never to have been any doubt of this fact. Kenyon¹ has collected some measurements. For most non-literary documents (letters, accounts, receipts, etc.) a single sheet was sufficient; for longer texts, especially literary ones, the necessary sheets were stuck together and made into a roll.² Rolls have been found measuring as much as 20 and even 45 yards. The regular format for ancient works of literature was the papyrus roll. There is a large fragment of a papyrus roll among the Leipzig fragments of the Psalter.¹ It was usual to write on that side of the sheet on which the fibres ran horizontally (recto); the other side (verso) was used only exceptionally.² When a sheet of papyrus bears writing on both sides, in different hands, it may generally be assumed that the writing on the recto is the earlier of the two. Only in exceptional cases were the sheets of a papyrus roll written on both sides; Nestle³ refers to Revelation v. 1, where some authorities read “a book written within and without” or “on the front and on the back.” In the later centuries of antiquity we find also the papyrus book or codex, which finally triumphs over the roll. It is not true that the transition from roll to book was the result of the introduction of parchment. To give only a few instances, the British Museum possesses a fragment of a papyrus codex of the Iliad, probably of the 3rd century A.D.⁴ Among the Oxyrhynchus Papyri there is a leaf from a codex of the gospels, containing Matthew i. 1–9, 12, 14–20, of the 3rd century, besides other fragments of Biblical codices. The University Library at Heidelberg possesses twenty-seven leaves from an old codex of the Septuagint. And the celebrated fragment of the “Logia” from Oxyrhynchus also once formed part of a codex.

When we consider the important part played by papyrus in the life of the ancient world, it is by no means surprising to find it mentioned in Scripture. The papyrus plant is spoken of in Job viii. 11 and Isaiah xxxv. 7; in the former passage the translators of the Septuagint use the word papyros, and again in Job xl. 16 (21) and Isaiah xix. 6. The "ark of bulrushes" in which Moses was laid (Exodus ii. 3) was a small papyrus boat,¹ like the "vessels of bulrushes" in Isaiah xviii. 2.² The writer of the Second Epistle of St. John mentions papyrus as a writing material, for the chartes referred to in verse 12 was doubtless a sheet of papyrus. So too the "books" that Timothy was requested to bring with him to St. Paul (2 Tim. iv. 13) were no doubt made of papyrus, for they are expressly distinguished from "the parchments."

We may now turn to the recent discoveries of papyri and see what their value has been to scholarship in general.

The first recorded purchase of papyri by European visitors to Egypt was in 1778. In that year a nameless dealer in antiquities bought from some peasants a papyrus roll of documents from the year 191-192 A.D., and looked on while they set fire to fifty or so more simply to enjoy the aromatic smoke that was produced.³ Since that date an enormous quantity of inscribed papyri in all possible languages, of ages varying from a thousand to nearly five thousand years, have been recovered from the magic soil of the ancient seats of civilisation in the Nile Valley. From about 1820 to 1840 the museums of Europe acquired quite a respectable number of papyri from Memphis and Letopolis in Middle Egypt, and from This, Panopolis, Thebes, Hermonthis, Elephantine, and Syene in Upper Egypt. Not many scholars took any notice of them at first, and only a very few read and profited by them.

The next decisive event, apart from isolated finds, was the discovery of papyri in the province of El-Fayûm (Middle Egypt) in 1877. To the north of the capital, Medinet el-Fayûm, lay a number of mounds of rubbish and debris, marking the site of the ancient "City of Crocodiles," afterwards called "The City of the Arsinoïtes," and these now yielded up hundreds and thousands of precious sheets and scraps. Since then there has been a rapid succession of big finds, which have not ceased even yet: we are still in a period of important discoveries. In the external history of the discoveries the most noteworthy feature is that so many of the papyri have been dug up with the spade from Egyptian rubbish-heaps.¹ Antiquaries had set the example by excavating in search of the foundations of ancient temples or fragments of prehistoric pottery, and now the excavators seek papyri. The excavations carried out by Drs. Bernard P. Grenfell and Arthur S. Hunt rank with the most celebrated archaeological excavations of modern times both in the delicacy of their operations and in the value of their results. The fact that so many of the papyri are found among the dust-heaps of ancient cities is a valuable indication of their general significance. The multitude of papyri from the Fayûm, from Oxyrhynchus-

Behnesa, etc., do not, as was at first supposed, represent the remains of certain great archives. They have survived as part of the contents of ancient refuse-heaps and rubbish-shoots. There the men of old cast out their bundles of discarded documents, from offices public and private, their worn-out books and parts of books; and there these things reposed, tranquilly abiding their undreamt-of fate.

The papyri are almost invariably non-literary in character. For instance, they include legal documents of all possible kinds: leases, bills and receipts, marriage-contracts, bills of divorce, wills, decrees issued by authority, denunciations, suings for the punishment of wrong-doers, minutes of judicial proceedings, tax-papers in great numbers. Then there are letters and notes, schoolboys' exercise-books, magical texts, horoscopes, diaries, etc. As regards their contents these non-literary documents are as many-sided as life itself. Those in Greek, several thousand in number, cover a period of roughly a thousand years. The oldest go back to the early Ptolemaic period, i.e. the 3rd century B.C.¹; the most recent bring us well into the Byzantine period. All the chequered history of Hellenised and Romanised Egypt in that thousand years passes before our eyes on those tattered sheets.

numbers of others in Aramaic,¹ Demotic, Coptic,² Arabic,³ Latin, Hebrew,⁴ and Persian. Of the most ancient hieroglyphic papyri we here say nothing, but there should be no possibility of disagreement as to the value of those we have mentioned for the scientific study of antiquity in the widest sense. They mean nothing less than the reconstitution of a large portion of the life lived by the ancients. They tell their story of the past with a freshness, warmth, and sincerity such as we can boast of in no ancient writer

¹ Extremely important are the Aramaic Papyri discovered at Assuan, edited by A. H. Sayce with the assistance of A. E. Cowley and with appendices by W. Spiegelberg and Seymour de Ricci, London, 1906. They consist of ten large original documents written in Aramaic by Jews of Upper Egypt in the time of the Persian kings Xerxes, Artaxerxes, and Darius, 471 or 470 to 411 B.C. Their eminent importance has been set forth in its linguistic, religious, and legal aspects by Th. Nöldeke, Zeitschr. f. Assyriologie, 20, p. 130 ff.; Mark Lidzbarski, Deutsche Lit.-Ztg. 27 (1906) col. 3205 ff.; E. Schürer, Theol. Lit.-Ztg. 32 (1907) col. 1 ff.; U. Wilcken, Archiv f. Papyrusforschung, 4, p. 228 ff.; Friedrich Schulthess, Göttingische gelehrte Anzeigen, 1907, p. 181 ff.; and many others. There is a handy edition by W. Staerk in Lietzmann's Kleine Texte, Nos. 22, 23, Bonn, 1907.—To these have now been added new Aramaic documents from Elephantine, cf. Eduard Sachau, Drei aramäische Papyrusurkunden aus Elephantine, aus den Abhandlungen der Kgl. Preuss. Akademie der Wissenschaften 1907, Berlin, 1907; and W. Staerk, Aramaäische Urkunden zur Geschichte des Judentums im vi. und v. Jahrhundert vor Chr. sprachlich und sachlich erklärt, in Lietzmann's Kleine Texte, No. 32, Bonn, 1908. At a meeting of the Berlin Academy, 26 November, 1908, Sachau spoke of a Jewish papyrus from Elephantine containing a long list of names.

and in but very few of the ancient inscriptions. The record handed down by the ancient authors is always, even in the best of cases, indirect, and has always been somehow or other touched up or toned down. The inscriptions are often cold and lifeless.¹ The papyrus sheet is far more living. We see the handwriting, the irregular characters, we see men. We gaze into the inmost recesses of individual lives.

Despite their unassuming simplicity the papyri are destined to put new blood in the veins of learning. Legal history in the first place, but afterwards the general history of culture, and notably the history of language will derive benefit therefrom. And here, paradoxical as it will seem to many, let me say that the non-literary papyri are of greater value to the historical inquirer than are the literary. We rejoice by all means when ancient books, or fragments of them, are recovered from the soil of Egypt, especially when they are lost literary treasures. But scientifically speaking the real treasure hidden in the field of Egypt is not so much of ancient art and literature as there lies buried, but all the ancient life, actual and tangible, that is waiting to be given to the world once more. It is regrettable, therefore, to see the merest scrap of an ancient book treated as if it were something sacred—immediately published with notes and facsimile, even if it be a fragment of some forgotten scribbler who deserved his fate—while on the other hand the non-literary items are often not even printed in full. Yet it may well happen that a solitary lease of no intrinsic interest contains the long-looked-for link completing the chain of development from some early Hellenistic form down to its representative in some dialect of modern Greek.

Something which an editor, with his eye bent on a special subject of interest to himself, perhaps suppressed as “unimportant,” may mean a priceless discovery to another.

It cannot be my task here to recite the long list of papyrus publications, great and small; I refer to the bibliographies mentioned above. Every year, however, increases the number of new editions. The name by which a papyrus is known may refer either to the place where it is now preserved (e.g. Berlin Documents; London, Paris, Geneva, Strassburg, Leipzig, Heidelberg, etc. Papyri), the person to whom it belongs (e.g. the Archduke Rainer’s Papyri, the Amherst Papyri, Reinach Papyri, etc.), or to the place where it was found (e.g. Oxyrhynchus Papyri, Tebtunis Papyri, Hibeh Papyri, etc.). From the scientific point of view it would certainly be best to name the papyri after the place where found, and this will always be practicable where a great number of papyri have been found in the same place and kept in one collection. At any rate, when quoting¹ a particular papyrus one should never omit to state where and when it was written. The special excellence of these texts is due in no small degree to the fact that so many of them are dated to the very year and day of the month, and that it is nearly always certain where they came from. At some time in the indefinite future a Corpus (or perhaps several Corpora) Papyrorum may be called for. It would be impossible at present to undertake such a collection, for the discoveries show no signs of coming to a standstill.

The prevailing tendency being to overestimate the importance of whatever is literary, it is no wonder that theologians have congratulated themselves most of all on the recovery of parts of the Bible and early Christian books. We have, truly enough, every reason to be thankful that sources and textual authorities are still forthcoming from such venerably early periods of our faith. I have given elsewhere¹ a list of the most important Greek fragments recovered down to 1908, including altogether about fifty fragments, large and small. The more recent publications enable us to add largely to the list. I will mention a few particulars.² Since 1903 Grenfell and Hunt³ have published a second fragment of "Logia," and a fragment of a new Michelsen, Theologisch Tijdschrift, 1905, p. 160 f.—I may be allowed one remark concerning the first "Logia" fragment of 1897. The last clause ("colon") of Logion No. 4, σχίσον τὸ ξύλον καὶ γὰρ ἐκεῖ εἰμι, "split the wood and I am there," which has been so much discussed, has a remarkable parallel (not yet pointed out, I believe) in the Gospel of Thomas, ch. x. The boy Jesus heals a wood-cutter whose axe had fallen and severely injured his foot, and dismisses him with the words, ἀνάστα νῦν · σχίσε τὰ ξύλα καὶ μνημόνευέ μου, "Arise now: split the pieces of wood and remember Me." This parallel suggests that the Logion is a word of consolation for those engaged in dangerous work.

gospel,¹ which was followed by yet another fragment of a gospel, of considerable size.² Another fragment which the two distinguished explorers also consider to be a portion of a gospel,³ is perhaps rather to be looked on as part of a commentary or a sermon.⁴ The Second Part of the Amherst Papyri contains a large fragment of "The Shepherd of Hermas" and several Septuagint fragments, one of which has only been identified since the book appeared.⁵ The Fourth Part of the Oxyrhynchus Papyri gave us, besides the texts mentioned above, a good-sized fragment of the Septuagint Genesis,⁶ and a still larger piece of the Epistle to the Hebrews,⁷ which was found written on the back of an Epitome of Livy. The Sixth

It is a parchment fragment from Oxyrhynchus, now published in the Oxyrhynchus Papyri, Part V. No. 840; and separately, Fragment of an Uncanonical Gospel from Oxyrhynchus, London, 1908. The fragment has already called forth a copious literature. Cf. Part also presented us with new fragments.¹ There are other Biblical fragments on papyrus, some of them very old, of which I received information by letter when they were still unpublished,² e.g. a large 4th-century MS. of Genesis obtained by Carl Schmidt (of Berlin). Adolf Harnack has announced³ the discovery of a fragment of Ignatius by the same Carl Schmidt. Several ancient Christian fragments in the Strassburg collection of papyri have been published by O. Plasberg.⁴ Anton Swoboda thinks he has discovered in one of the papyri of the "Fayûm Towns" volume some fragments of a Gnostic (Naassenic) psalm about Christ's descent into hell.⁵

Of great importance too are the Coptic fragments of Biblical, Gnostic, and other early Christian writings, among which I have already mentioned the Heidelberg "Acta Pauli."⁶ They are very numerous,¹ and have lately been reinforced by two extensive fragments of translations of the first Epistle of Clement, now at Berlin² and Strassburg,³ and by a beautifully preserved MS. of the Proverbs of Solomon.⁴ Graeco-Sahidic fragments of the Psalms, of considerable extent, have been published by Carl Wessely⁵ from the collection of papyri belonging to the Archduke Rainer. An entirely new field has been opened up by the discovery, also due to Carl Schmidt (Berlin), of the first fragments of Christian literature in the language of ancient Nubia.⁶

⁴ Archiv für Papyrusforschung, 2, p. 217 ff.: a piece with proverbs, not yet identified, and probably quite new, to the interpretation of which the editor made excellent contributions; a fragment of 2 Samuel xv. and xvi., Septuagint; a parchment fragment of the fifth century A.D. with remains of a Greek translation of Genesis xxv. 19-22 and xxvi. 3, 4. This last piece, which has already been used in the great Cambridge Septuagint, where it is quoted as Δ₃, is in my opinion very important indeed. It presents a text remarkably at variance with the LXX but approximating to the Hebrew, and its variants are remarkable for the occurrence four times over of σπορά, a reading not hitherto recorded, instead of σπέρμα (xxvi. 3, 4). We may conclude with great probability that this is a direct protest against St. Paul's celebrated insistence on the singular σπέρμα (Gal. iii. 16), and that the papyrus is therefore the survival of a post-Christian, hitherto unknown Jewish revision of the LXX or new translation. Graecus Venetus, a late and probably Jewish writer (ed. O. Gebhardt, Lipsiae, 1875), has σπόρος in most of the Messianic passages of Genesis; in xxvi. 3, 4 he has σπόρος three times and σπέρμα once.

The non-literary papyri also contain much that is of direct value in the study of Biblical and Christian antiquities. First must be mentioned the Aramaic and Greek documents which from the 5th century B.C. until long after the establishment of the Empire were written by Jewish inhabitants of all parts of Egypt. These furnish statistics of that cosmopolitan Judaism⁷ which was such a help to the Christian mission. Next come the papyri which enable us to fix the chronology of the Egyptian Prefect Munatius Felix, and thereby the chronology of an important treatise by Justin Martyr, or which make it possible to determine the site of hitherto uncertain Egyptian places mentioned in early Christian texts. The discoveries have presented us with a few precious original documents of the time of the Christian persecutions. We have five libelli issued to Christian libellatici (or, as U. Wilcken suggested to me in a letter of 1 March, 1902, to falsely suspected pagans¹) at the time of the Decian persecution,² and then there is the letter of the Christian presbyter Psenosiris in the Great Oasis to the presbyter Apollo on behalf of a banished Christian woman.³ Highly remarkable is a Christian original letter¹ sent from Rome to the Fayûm at some time during the last thirty years of the 3rd century, which is probably the oldest original Christian letter at present known. There follows a long series of Christian letters, from the 4th century onwards, which have now been published some time, but deserve, I think, more notice than they have yet received. They are manifestos from those circles of Christendom concerning which there are scarcely any other sources of information available. The extensive correspondence of Abinnaeus should be specially mentioned in this connexion.² Even the legal documents of the Byzantine period, e.g. the church inventories, which are not yet all published, contain many details of interest. Certain points, such as the palaeographical history of the so-called monogram of Christ, ✠, receive fresh illumination from the papyri.³ In an article entitled "Pagan and Christian in Egypt,"¹ Ulrich Wilcken published a number of new things, two of which deserve special mention: an amulet with an interesting text of the Lord's Prayer,² and a petition of Appion, bishop of Syene, to the Emperors Theodosius II. and Valentinian III.³ This article, by the way, is a model example of the sort of commentary that is called for by such texts. The last publication to be mentioned here is that by Lietzmann⁴ of a curious text which still presents many unsolved riddles.

It will be admitted that our knowledge of Christian antiquity has been very considerably enriched by these literary and non-literary Christian papyri from Egypt. Our subject, however, is chiefly concerned with the non-Christian texts and the great indirect value that they possess for Bible students. The following chapters will pursue that subject in detail. In these introductory observations, however, we may remark that, at a time when Greek papyri were still among the rare curiosities of a few museums, Heinrich Wilhelm Josias Thiersch realised their value for Septuagint philology.⁵ Even before him Friedrich Wilhelm Sturz⁶ had made use of the *Charta Borgiana*⁷ (the first papyrus ever brought to Europe, in 1778) in studying the Alexandrian Old Testament, and had cited it, for instance, to explain the word ἀπάτωρ, "without father," in Hebrews vii. 3.¹

Of late years the papyri have been used by almost all the Biblical scholars whom I named above when speaking of the inscriptions. Apart from the grammatical studies which he afterwards incorporated in his "Grammar," James Hope Moulton has made valuable lexical contributions,² which have lately been continued in collaboration with George Milligan.³ The papyri have been successfully appealed to in linguistic problems by J. de Zwaan in his article⁴ on Mark xiv. 41, and in his Dutch edition of Burton's Syntax of New Testament Moods and Tenses,⁵ and Wilhelm Heitmüller⁶ did the same before him. By means of the papyri J. Rendel Harris⁷ has advanced the exegesis of the New Testament Epistles, and H. Hauschildt⁸ the history of the title "presbyteros." Hermann Müller⁹ and Alfred Wikenhauser¹⁰ have also made a beginning with such studies. Hans Lietzmann made industrious use of the papyri in his Commentaries, already mentioned, and made the Greek papyri available for theological class-work by publishing his little book of texts.¹ Willoughby C. Allen did not neglect the papyri in his Commentary on St. Matthew.²

As a matter of course, the Greek philologists above mentioned in connexion with the inscriptions often compare the Septuagint and the New Testament with the evidence of the papyri whenever they happen to discuss the international Greek of the Imperial and earlier age. The most important achievements with regard specially to papyrology are those of Edwin Mayser³ and Wilhelm Crönert.⁴ Mayser's work has now found a Biblical counterpart in R. Helbing's Septuagint Grammar.

(c) The OSTRACA, constituting the third main group⁵ of texts, are closely allied to the papyri. We approach with them an entirely modern science, a science which so far has relied on two men only for its main support. One of them, Ulrich Wilcken, laid the foundations with his brilliant work on *Greek Ostraca from Egypt and Nubia*⁶; the other, W. E. Crum, by the publication of his great collection of Christian ostraca,¹ has added fresh material. Addressed primarily to Coptologists, Crum's book is nevertheless of importance to Greek scholars and theologians.

The question "What are ostraca?" is easily answered. They are pieces of broken pottery, on which something has been written. "Why were they so neglected in the past?" is a more difficult question.² I am reminded of a sentence in one of Pastor von Bodelschwingh's annual reports of a scrap-collecting organisation for the support of the Bethel charities near Bielefeld.³ "Nothing is absolutely worthless," he says, "except bits of broken earthenware and the fag-ends of cigars," and the opinion seems to have been shared by the peasants of Egypt, at least so far as bits of pottery were concerned. They rummaged among ancient ruins, and whenever they came across such pitiable objects as bits of earthenware vessels, they threw them away at once. Many a European with a scholar's training must have been quite convinced that ancient potsherds were valueless, even when there was writing visible on them¹; otherwise one cannot understand why they were to all intents and purposes ignored by research for so long a time, comparatively. After all, what can there be more pitiful than an earthen potsherd? The prophet in his emphatic irony could think of no image more apt to describe man's nothingness than that of a potsherd among potsherds.²

In the time of the ancients potsherds were not thrown away as useless for ever. From the rubbish-heaps they not unfrequently made their way once more to the humble homes of the proletariat, there to be used as writing material. Few of us, however, realised this fact until Wilcken published his book on the subject. Of course in our schooldays we had heard of the judgment of Clisthenes, but in such a way that most of us, if asked, would have said that ostracism was the Athenian statesman's own invention, and that he caused small tablets of earthenware to be made specially for the people to record their votes. As a matter of fact, four of the ostraca employed have been discovered at Athens,³ and two at least of them are obviously pieces of broken vessels. Wilcken goes on to show most convincingly that the habit of writing on ostraca must have been in force at Athens in the sixth century B.C. at latest, and that the potsherd was highly popular as writing material throughout the ancient Mediterranean world. With regard to the Hellenistic period we know that it was so, firstly from the evidence of various authors, and secondly from thousands of potsherds that were written on then and which have been preserved, with the writing still upon them, in the burning, rainless soil of Egypt. Like the papyri, which the same agency has preserved to us in such numbers, the ostraca are a mirror of the changes of nationality that occurred in the Nile Valley. All sorts of alphabets are represented—the Hieratic and Demotic scripts of the old Egyptian, besides Greek, Latin, Aramaic, Coptic, and Arabic.

Of all the various kinds there can be little doubt that the Greek are at present the most numerous. They range from the time of the first Ptolemies down to the beginning of the Arab occupation, i.e. over a period of roughly a thousand years. The texts with which they are inscribed are of the most miscellaneous kind—letters, contracts, bills, directions as to payments, decrees, and even extracts from classical authors. On the whole we may say that the texts met with on ostraca are the same in contents as those of the papyri—which we have already seen to be so astonishingly abundant—the only difference being that the ostraca on account of their size generally have shorter texts than the papyri. The great majority of the ostraca we possess are certainly tax-receipts.

In the second book of his Greek Ostraca Wilcken published 1,624 specimens of these modest records of the past. No less than 1,355 of these had never been published before: they were hunted out with infinite pains by Wilcken in the museums of Berlin, London, Paris, Rome, Turin, Leyden, etc., and in private collections.¹ The task of decipherment was one of extreme difficulty ; the writing on the ostraca is cursive, often running into grotesque eccentricities, with a whole host of abbreviations and special signs. But the masterly skill which Wilcken had shown as one of the decipherers of the Berlin papyri was again most brilliantly displayed. The result is that these humble texts are now ready to the scholar's hand, not indeed in a form that presents no problems and enigmas, but at least so edited as to be studied without effort.

We are further indebted to Wilcken for a good deal of the historical discussion of all this new material. His Book I. constitutes a commentary on the grand scale, not in the sense that each single one of the ostraca receives separate interpretation (brief notes are given to many of them in Book II.), but in the form of a systematised discussion of the whole enormous miscellany. First comes a detailed introduction on the ostraca as writing material, including the origin and fortunes of the ostraca. The formulae employed in receipts are next examined, and the author then plunges into the minutiae of the Egyptian system of taxes and duties in the Ptolemaic and Roman periods. Next come economic observations, and researches on topography, metrology, chronology, and palaeography. Papyri, inscriptions, and ancient authors are constantly quoted in illustration and comparison. The book was dedicated to Theodor Mommsen, and no offering more worthy of the great master's acceptance could have been produced. It is in every respect a monument of learning.

tirely new collections, such as the one at Heidelberg, have been formed. Egyptian dealers (and many European collectors) still attach no great value to ostraca : twenty times as much is often asked for a papyrus text of the same length. For a small outlay it is easy to acquire an extensive collection of ostraca. That is one good result of the immemorial prejudice which, it would almost seem, the centuries have bequeathed to us : the idea that a potsherd is more plebeian than a bit of papyrus.

To theologians the ostraca are of no small value. They add many new touches to our knowledge of the life of ancient times. They throw light on large tracts of the civilisation upon which the Greek Old Testament, many of the books of the Apocrypha, the works of Philo and of the Egyptian Christians were based. They show us the men of the age of fulfilment¹ in their workaday clothes, and they afford reliable evidence concerning the language spoken in the Hellenised Mediterranean world at the time when the apostolic mission became to "the Greeks" a Greek. In these facts lies the great value of the ostraca (as of the non-literary papyri) to the student of Greek Judaism and of the first centuries of Christianity. Detailed proof of this assertion will be offered in the following chapters.

Even more decidedly than the papyri, the ostraca are documents belonging to the lower orders of the people. The potsherd was in fact the cheapest writing material there was, obtainable by every one gratis from the nearest rubbish-heap. For this reason it was so admirably adapted for recording the vote of the Demos in cases of ostracism. The ostrakon was beneath the dignity of the well-to-do. As a proof of the poverty of Cleanthes the Stoic it is related that he could not afford papyrus and therefore wrote on ostraca or on leather.² In the same way we find the writers of Coptic potsherd letters even in Christian times apologising now and then to their correspondents for having made use of an ostracon in temporary lack of papyrus.¹ We, however, have cause to rejoice at the breach of etiquette. The ostraca take us right to the heart of the class to which the primitive Christians were most nearly related, and in which the new faith struck root in the great world.

Direct information relating to the very oldest Christianity has not yet been yielded to us by the ostraca. The Coptic potsherds, however, with their abundance of letters, fragments of letters, and similar texts, are of quite unique value for the light they throw on the religious and social history of Christian Egypt; and they have lately been reinforced by Greek ostraca of the 5th century A.D.² On the other hand, the space available for writing being so small, we can hardly expect to recover on ostraca any large remains of early Christian literary texts.

The ostraca will restore to us no lost fathers of the Church and no lost heretical writers. They have yielded hitherto only short quotations from classical authors, and those probably schoolroom exercises. The writers of ostraca were as a rule quite innocent of literary interests. After the scanty fragments discussed by Egger¹ there seemed but little hope of recovering even Biblical quotations,² until R. Reitzenstein published from a Strassburg ostrakon of about the 6th century a hymn to the Virgin³ which showed decided marks of the influence of Luke i. Since then Crum, in his Coptic Ostraca, has given us ostraca with Greek quotations from the Bible, while Pierre Jouguet and Gustave Lefebvre have published a late ostrakon from Thebes with a rude drawing of "Saint Peter the Evangelist" and a few lines of Greek that have not yet been identified.⁴ Besides this Lefebvre has made known to us quite a series of gospel quotations in his Fragments Grecs des Évangiles sur Ostraka.⁵ This publication alone enables us to fill an empty page in the history of the New Testament. It gives us the text of 20 Greek ostraca, large and small, inscribed with portions of our gospels. They were purchased many years ago in Upper Egypt by Bouriant, and are now a treasured possession of the French Institute of Oriental Archaeology. The exact place and circumstances of their discovery could not be ascertained, but their authenticity is beyond question. Their age can be conjectured from the style of the handwriting, and it appears that they were written probably in the 7th century, in the time of the Arab conquest.

¹ Cf. Crum, Coptic Ostraca, p. 49. For example No. 129, p. 55: "Excuse me that I cannot find papyrus as I am in the country."

² My knowledge of these is at present confined to a notice in the Frankfurter Zeitung, 12 July, 1907, 2nd morning edition: "It is reported from Alexandria that the excavations in the ancient Christian town of Menas have brought to light amongst other things a series of valuable ostraca. These are in all probability the oldest Greek writings of the kind from the Christian period. Dr. H. J. Bell of the Manuscript Department of the British Museum examined with Dr. Kenyon a number of well-preserved specimens, and his results will be published in the forthcoming Third Report of the excavations. Among these documents are instructions for the payment of vine-dressers, wine-pressers (men who trod the grapes with their feet), laundrymen, and other workmen, for services rendered for the national sanctuary. Payment is made in money, in kind, or in food, and disabled workmen are also provided for. Comparisons with papyrus documents lead to the conclusion that the specimens hitherto deciphered belong to the 5th century. The same date is indicated by the stratum in which they were found. More than 200 ostraca have been recovered so far."

They afford interesting materials for palaeography and the history of the text¹ of the gospels which it is to be hoped will not be neglected by scholars. They contain in the handwriting of three different persons the text of Matt. xxvii. 31-32; Mark v. 40-41, ix. 17, 18, 22, xv. 21; Luke xii. 13-15,² 15-16, xxii. 40-45, 45-49, 49-53, 53-54, 55-59, 59-60, 61, 61-64, 65-69, 70-71; John i. 1-9, 14-17, xviii. 19-25, xix. 15-17.

² On the back of this ostrakon (no. 5) there is the name Luke and two lines which the editor could not account for. I print them in minuscules:—

This is certainly a fragment of Mark ix. 3:—

στιλβοντ[α λευκα λιαν]

The text runs thus:—

|---------------------------------|--------------------------------|
| ειπαν δε παντες | And they all said, Art Thou |
| συ ουν ει ο υς του θυ | then the Son of God? And |
| ο δε προς αυτους | He said unto them, Ye say that |
| εφη υμεις ¹ λεγετε | He said unto them, Ye say that |
| 5 οτι εγω ειμι οι δε | I am. And they said, What |
| ειπαν τι επι χριαν | further need have we witness |
| 10 εχομεν μαρτυριαν | (sic)? for we ourselves have |
| αυτοι γαρ ηκουσαμε ² | heard from . . . mouth. |
| απο του στοματος | |

Of the two characters in the left-hand margin (read ι'ο by Lefebvre) the ι is certainly a numeral (= 10) denoting that this ostracon is the tenth in a consecutive series. The preceding ostraca with Luke xxii. 40–69 do in fact bear the numbers 1–9. The ο however, which occurs with different pointing on most of the other members of this group, has not yet been explained. I conjecture that it is the number of a chapter according to an old ecclesiastical division. In the copy of the gospel from which the ostraca were made Luke xxii. 40 ff. would then belong to the 70th chapter of Luke, whereas in the usual ancient division into chapters³ it belongs to chapter 78.

It will be seen at once that among the 20 specimens the gospel of St. Luke is the most amply represented. Two ostraca contain the consecutive text of Luke xii. 13–16, and ten ostraca actually contain the complete text of Luke xxii. 40–71, i.e.

a large portion of the account of the Passion. The fact that these ten ostraca belong together is marked externally by the numerals 1-10 which, as mentioned above, the writer affixed to them. The fragments from St. John probably also belong to one and the same series. This observation is important in two ways. On the one hand it points to the fact that probably all these gospel ostraca represent a single find. This is confirmed by the occurrence of Mark ix. 3 on the back of one of the fragments of St. Luke, as already pointed out. That passage occurs in the account of the Transfiguration, which immediately precedes the section from which ostrakon no. 3 (Mark ix. 17, 18, 22) is taken. On the other hand we now have an indication of the nature of the whole collection, for light is thrown on the question, "For what purpose were they inscribed with texts from the gospels?"

If the ostrakon inscribed with Mark ix. 17 ff. were the only one that had come down to us it would be easy to suppose that the text was to be used as a curative amulet, in this case as an amulet against demoniacal possession. In the Heidelberg University Library, for instance, there are several Biblical amulets of this kind on parchment and papyrus. The editor of the ostraca tells us in fact that Perdrizet suggested the amulet hypothesis¹ to him. But the series of ten consecutive ostraca and the other series of which we may conjecture demand another explanation than this. It is inconceivable that anybody should have carried ten ostraca about with him as an amulet, for the simple reason that they would have been far too heavy. I have myself tried the experiment, though with no thought of amulets in my mind, for I have often carried ten or a dozen ostraca from my collection in my pockets to show to the audience at a lecture. It was in many respects a pleasing burden, but not in the least comfortable.

Lefebvre's own theory was that the ostraca were written to form a cheap gospel lectionary, a book (if we may use the expression) for private or public reading consisting of extracts (Pericopae) from the gospels or perhaps even a continuous text. This theory we must accept unless, as now seems to me more probable, the ostraca were copied out by poor candidates for deacon's orders at the command of their bishop.¹ Whoever has realised the character of ostraca in general will not be slow to perceive the real import of this new find. Ostraca were as a rule the writing material used by the poor²; a potsherd was to be had for nothing, even in the most straitened household, when some person or persons unknown had been unkind enough to break the oil-cruze or the kneading-pan. The person who wrote gospel texts on ostraca was a poor person: a would-be deacon, or perhaps a monk, a schoolboy, or a simple woman—some soul forgotten among the myriads that perish.

So we might add this superscription to Lefebvre's fascinating work: "The gospels in the hands of the common people, the gospel among the poor of Egypt at the time when the deluge of Islam was approaching." In the very selfsame division of society which made them what they are, the most democratic texts of all antiquity, we encounter once again the gospels. Six centuries have passed, during which they have been copied on papyrus, on parchment, yea even on purple vellum with letters of gold, and thinkers and potentates, rich men and renowned have read them. After their long journeying through the world the gospels are at home once more: on worthless castaway potsherds a poor man writes the imperishable words that are the heritage of the poor.

Our brief general description of the newly discovered texts is ended. New Testament in hand, let us now betake ourselves to the sites of excavations in the South and East and endeavour to decipher the stone inscriptions from the period which witnessed the great religious change.¹ Or, if we must remain at home, let us at least open the Sacred Book and compare it with the folio volumes of inscriptions, papyri, and ostraca. The New Testament is an exile here in the West, and we do well to restore it to its home in Anatolia. It is right to set it once more in the company of the unlearned, after it has made so long a stay amid the surroundings of modern culture. We have had hundreds of University chairs for the exact, scientific interpretation of the little Book—let us now listen while the homeland of the New Testament yields up its own authentic witness to the inquiring scholar.

THE LANGUAGE OF THE NEW TESTAMENT ILLUSTRATED FROM THE NEW TEXTS

1. As we study the New Testament on the lines indicated at the close of the preceding chapter, the first great impression we receive is that the language to which we are accustomed in the New Testament is on the whole just the kind of Greek that simple, unlearned folk of the Roman Imperial period were in the habit of using. The non-literary written memorials of that age at length have opened our eyes to the true linguistic position of the New Testament. That is the first and most easily demonstrated of the services rendered us by the new texts.¹

Fifteen years ago, when it began to be asserted with some confidence that the isolation of "New Testament" Greek as a separate entity was impossible from the scientific point of view, since it was practically identical with the popular international

Greek of the period, theologians¹ and philologists received the statement with more or less active dissent. One eminent Greek scholar² of the philological school said it was the language of a naturalist rather than a theologian, and those familiar with the polemical literature of that date will know what the reproach of naturalism then meant in Germany.³ Since then, however, the specialists have changed their minds on this not unimportant point. New Testament philology is at present undergoing thorough reconstruction; and probably all the workers concerned in it both on the Continent and in English-speaking countries⁴ are by this time agreed that the starting-point for the philological investigation of the New Testament must be the language of the non-literary papyri, ostraca, and inscriptions. The theory scored a complete victory in Albert Thumb's valuable book on the Greek Language in the Hellenistic age⁵; Stanislaus Witkowski acknowledged his adherence in the critical review which he gave (1904) of recent literature dealing with the Koiné.⁶ In a number of different articles,⁷ but more especially in his recent Grammar of the New Testament, James Hope Moulton worked out the most important of the details that result from the application of the theory; while Theodor Nägeli,¹ working by the same method, exhibited very effectively the vocabulary of St. Paul. Lastly, not to mention others, three philologists of repute have signified their acceptance of the theory and its results: firstly Jakob Wackernagel, in his article on the Greek language contributed to *Die Kultur der Gegenwart*²; secondly Ludwig Radermacher,³ who is himself engaged on a new Grammar of the New Testament for Germans; thirdly D. C. Hesselung,⁴ who at the same time gave us the comforting assurance that no dogma of the Church is threatened by the new method. There are also instances of Catholic theologians both of the Western⁵ and of the Eastern⁶ Church who have signified their approval.

What are the points concerned in judging of the language of the New Testament?

We may start from what is probably the average educated person's knowledge of the subject. He would say that "the original language" of the New Testament was Greek. This statement, however, is really very vague.

It is true, certainly, that it is a Greek New Testament which presents itself to the scholar for study, but within the New Testament there are portions of which "the original language" was not Greek, but Semitic. Jesus of Nazareth, the Man whose personality was the decisive impulse, did not speak Greek when He went about His public work. He spoke the local idiom of His native Galilee, the language which, in the night of betrayal, betrayed His disciple Peter to be a Galilean. This language was Aramaic, a dialect akin to Hebrew but not identical with it; and, to be quite exact, it was Galilean Aramaic that our Lord spoke. In that dialect the gospel was first preached. The ordinary reader of the Bible even now hears the last echo of the original when he comes upon such words as mammon, talitha cumi, abba, or such names as Barabbas, Martha, etc., which are all of them Aramaic. Moreover, the oldest record of the words that Jesus spake, the record of His apostle Matthew, was no doubt written in Aramaic for the Palestinian Christians who spoke that language. That most primitive version of our Lord's words has perished, unfortunately, so far as the Aramaic original is concerned. What would we give if we could recover but one papyrus book with a few leaves containing genuine Aramaic sayings of Jesus! For those few leaves we would, I think, part smilingly with the theological output of a whole century.

But it is of little use to speak further of this "if." It is more sensible to inquire why the words of Jesus are no longer extant in their original Aramaic. The answer is that Christianity, in becoming a world religion, gradually forgot its oldest records—records that had originated far away from the world and were unintelligible to the world—and so they were lost. The Christian missionaries with an Aramaic book of gospels in their hands would have been powerless to make propaganda in what was in fact a Greek or rather Hellenised world. An Aramaic gospel-book would have condemned Christianity to remain a Palestinian sect. Ere it could become a world religion it had to learn the language of the world, and that is why the gospels put on the habit of the world; for that reason St. Paul and others spoke and wrote the international language, and the New Testament took final form as a Greek book. The handful of earlier Aramaic copies vanished before the multitude of Greek manuscripts of the gospels, which from the second century onwards became more and more widely diffused. Their fate was the same as that of our spelling-books and copy-books. How many of the men who go down from the university with boxes full of Latin and Greek books and lecture notes will find still in existence at home the thumbled and ragged pages from which they first learnt the A B C?

In the Roman Imperial period the language of the great world was Greek, which numbered more speakers than the Latin with its millions. The great military expeditions of Alexander the Great had combined with the more peaceful victories of commerce, art, literature, and science, to produce, just at the great turning-point in religious history, a more or less complete Hellenisation of those portions of the Mediterranean area which had been from time immemorial the home of civilisation. In the south of Europe, in Asia Minor,¹ Egypt, and along the northern shores of Africa, the culture and even the language was Greek, right down to the lower orders, of urban society especially. Even among the residents of Rome there were plenty who spoke Greek. We know, for instance, that the Roman Jews of the period, a numerous body, spoke Greek almost exclusively.

In this Hellenised world, however, men no longer spoke local dialects of Greek. The world had become unified, and men spoke no more the ancient Doric, or Æolic, Ionic, or Attic, but a single Greek international language, one common tongue. The precise origin of this international Greek, which it is usual to refer to as the Koinḗ ("common" language), has not been made out,¹ nor need it detain us here. The fact remains that in the period which gave birth to Christianity there was an international Greek language.

It was not indeed a uniform entity. Two main divisions are recognisable, though the boundary between them is anything but fixed. Like every living language this international Greek possessed one form marked by greater freedom, and another marked by greater restraint. The one we call colloquial, the other literary.

The colloquial language in its turn went off into various shades of distinction, according to the refinement of the speaker. It was natural, moreover, for the literary language to display varieties of coloration. One influence was at that time powerfully affecting it, namely a romantic enthusiasm for the great classics of the former age in Attic Greek. People imitated their manner of writing in the conviction that here once for all the standard of good Greek had been set. The followers of this romantic movement are called "Atticists" after the model they chose for imitation. Their convention was all but binding on the cultured and literary of that epoch, and has always remained one of the great powers in the intellectual world, influencing our humanistic studies even at the present day. We still possess works in plenty that were written by the ancient Atticists, and we are well informed as to their theories.¹ We do, moreover, possess memorials of the colloquial language of culture in that period, since there were several authors who paid little or no attention to the rules of the Atticists.

Memorials of the popular colloquial language, on the other hand, memorials of the spoken Greek of the people, were scarcely known to the general run of scholars at a period distant only some score or so of years from the present day. The lower orders, in all their wide extent, who in the time of the Roman Empire made up the bulk of the population in the great cities of the Mediterranean coast and the interior,—the non-literary people, whose vulgarisms and expressive terms were scorned and tabooed by the Atticists as weeds in the garden of language,—the masses of the people whom St. Paul at the end of 1 Cor. i. describes with the warmth of a blood-relation—this whole stratum of society seemed, with its language, to be buried for ever in oblivion.

And what judgment was usually formed of the language of the New Testament, under these circumstances?

We may state the case thus: In many details due emphasis was given to its relation with the contemporary international Greek, but on the whole it was isolated by the science of language, and raised to the rank of a separate linguistic entity under the title of "New Testament" Greek.

Two circumstances more particularly helped to make this isolative, dogmatic method prevail. From the point of view of religion and theology the isolation of the New Testament was encouraged by the doctrine of mechanical inspiration, combining with a very lively conception of the canon of the New Testament as a hard-and-fast boundary. From the point of view of language and philology every one with a classical training felt the strong contrast between the language of Scripture and the Attic Greek he had learnt at school. Enslaved by the immemorial prejudice of the Atticists, that the Greek world ended with Alexander the Great (whereas it really began with him), many who read the Greek New Testament never dreamt of taking up other Greek texts of the Imperial (and post-Alexandrian) period. The result was that for such readers there was a great gap between their New Testament and the earlier stage of Greek with which they were familiar, viz. the classical Attic of the 5th and 4th centuries B.C.¹ Not only the theologians were at fault: philologists were in the same condemnation. So recently as 1894 the great Greek scholar

Friedrich Blass,¹ of Halle, despite his marvellous knowledge of the whole range of Greek literature, asserted that New Testament Greek must be "recognised as something peculiar, obeying its own laws."

We owe it to the newly discovered or at least newly appreciated records that this isolative method of treatment has been given up. Of the literary language, with its trained obedience to artificial rules, there were productions enough extant already. Then came the inscribed stones, papyri, and potsherds—themselves not absolutely free from the tyranny of school and office usage²—and gave us a wealth of documents representative of the colloquial language, especially in its popular form, just as it had grown and was still growing in a state of nature.³ The papyri and ostraca particularly furnished ample material for comparative purposes, first as regards phonology and accident, and then as regards the meanings conveyed by words. The inscriptions, however, also produced a surprising harvest, principally of the lexical variety.

2. The work to be accomplished by the linguistic historian on the New Testament is barely begun, but one thing is clear already. The New Testament has been proved to be, as a whole, a monument of late colloquial Greek, and in the great majority of its component parts a monument of the more or less popular colloquial language.

The most popular in tone are the synoptic gospels,¹ especially when they are reporting the sayings of Jesus. Even St. Luke, with his occasional striving after elegance, has not deprived them of their simple beauty. The Epistle of St. James again clearly re-echoes the popular language of the gospels.

The Johannine writings, including the Revelation, are also linguistically deep-rooted in the most popular colloquial language. The Logos, occurring in the very first line of the gospel, has blinded most critics to the essential character of a book which, for all its share in the world's history, is a book of the people.

St. Paul too can command the terse pithiness of the homely gospel speech, especially in his ethical exhortations as pastor. These take shape naturally in clear-cut maxims such as the people themselves use and treasure up. But even where St. Paul is arguing to himself and takes more to the language of the middle class, even where he is carried away by the priestly fervour of the liturgist and by the enthusiasm of the Psalmist, his Greek never becomes literary. It is never disciplined, say, by the canon of the Atticists, never tuned to the Asian rhythm¹: it remains non-literary.² Thickly studded with rugged, forceful words taken from the popular idiom, it is perhaps the most brilliant example of the artless though not inartistic colloquial prose of a travelled city-resident of the Roman Empire, its wonderful flexibility making it just the very Greek for use in a mission to all the world.

We are thus left with the total impression that the great mass of the texts which make up the New Testament, forming at the same time the most important part of the sacred volume in point of contents, are popular in character. The traces of literary language found in some few of the other texts cannot do away with this impression. On the contrary, the contrast in which the Epistle to the Hebrews, for instance, stands linguistically to the earlier texts of Primitive Christianity, is peculiarly instructive to us. It points to the fact that the Epistle to the Hebrews, with its more definitely artistic, more literary language³ (corresponding to its theological subject-matter), constituted an epoch in the history of the new religion. Christianity is beginning to lay hands on the instruments of culture; the literary and theological period has begun. There will be more to say on this head in the next chapter.

³ Nobody could appreciate this contrast more correctly or express it more happily than Origen (quoted in Eusebius, Ecl. Hist. VI. xxv. 11) has done: ὅτι ὁ χαρακτήρ τῆς λέξεως τῆς πρὸς Ἑβραίους ἐπιγεγραμμένης ἐπιστολῆς οὐκ ἔχει τὸ ἐν λόγῳ ἰδιωτικὸν τοῦ ἀποστόλου ὁμολογήσαντος ἑαυτὸν ἰδιώτην εἶναι τῷ λόγῳ τοιτέστι τῇ φράσει, ἀλλὰ ἐστὶν ἡ ἐπιστολὴ συνθέσει τῆς λέξεως Ἑλληνικωτέρα, πᾶς ὁ ἐπιστάμενος κρίνειν φράσεων διαφορὰς ὁμολογήσαι ἀν—“that the linguistic character of the epistle entitled ‘to the Hebrews’ has none of that rudeness of speech which the apostle himself confessed when he said [2 Cor. xi. 6] he was rude of speech, i.e. in expression, that on the contrary the epistle is more Greek in its stylistic structure, will be admitted by every one who is able to judge of differences of style.”

The modern conception of New Testament Greek is not altogether a new thing: our advances in knowledge rarely are. Under the late Roman Empire, when the old learning and culture came into hostile collision with Christianity, pagan controversialists spoke mockingly of the language of the New Testament as a boatman's idiom. The Christian apologists accepted the taunt and made the despised simplicity of that language their well-warranted boast.¹ The hopeless attempt to prove the Bible as a whole and the New Testament in particular to be artistically perfect in its external form was first made by Latin apologists.² The same theory reappeared many centuries later in the conflict between the so-called Purists and Hebraists,² and was passionately maintained and disputed by these two rival schools of

³ See especially the account in Winer and Schmiedel, § 2, p. 4 ff.—The latest phase of New Testament philology has sometimes been described as a revival of the strife between the Hebraists and the Purists. That is, however, not quite accurate. The primary dispute no longer concerns the fact of Hebrew (or rather, Semitic) intrusions in the Greek of the New Testament: no one denies the existence of Semiticisms; opinions are only divided with reference to the relative proportion of these Semiticisms. On the other hand, there is now no assertion of the "purity" of New Testament Greek in the sense of the old disputants. The new tendency in the work now being done is to emphasise the popular and non-literary element in the language of the apostles and to protest against the dogmatic isolation of New Testament philology.—As early as 1863 we find Bishop Lightfoot remarking with the keen vision of a seer in one of his lectures: ". . . if we could only recover letters that ordinary people wrote to each other without any thought of being literary, we should have the greatest possible help for the understanding of the language of the N.T. generally." (Note by the Rev. J. Pulliblack in J. H. Moulton's Grammar,² p. 242.) Such letters (and other texts) have since then been made accessible in great abundance by the papyri and ostraca.

Biblical interpretation. To many it appeared as something perfectly obvious that Holy Scripture must be clothed in language at least as classical as that of Demosthenes or Plato, and assertions to the contrary were felt to be an outrage upon the Holy Ghost. We for our part are on the side of those who see beauty in the wild rose-bush as well as in a Gloire de Dijon. What is natural is also beautiful, and does not cease to be beautiful until artificiality and pretence step in. Thus in our opinion the new method of philological treatment brings out the peculiar beauty of the New Testament, by establishing the popular simplicity of the language in which it is written. The relation in which the language of the people stands to the artificial language of literature reminds us of the Master's own words, when He said, "Consider the lilies of the field, how they grow; they toil not, neither do they spin: and yet I say unto you, that even Solomon in all his glory was not arrayed like one of these."

3. How truly valuable the newly recorded documents are in the study of the language of the New Testament can only be realised by examples. In the following pages, therefore, some characteristic examples have been selected from the vast mass of available material. With regard, however, to the first point to be illustrated, viz. the phonology and accidence, there is no need to go into details here; a few remarks of a general nature will suffice.¹

A. The characteristic features of the living Greek language that was in international use are most clearly seen in the phonology and accidence. The assumption of a special New Testament or Biblical Greek is hopelessly refuted by the observations made in this field. All the hundreds of morphological details in the Biblical texts which strike a reader accustomed to Plato and Xenophon will be found also in the contemporary "profane" records of international Greek, especially in those texts which have come down to us in their original form without passing through the refining fires of an Atticist purgatory. They occur in the inscriptions, but most of all in the ostraca and papyri. P. W. Schmiedel's new edition of the Accidence of Winer's Grammar of the New Testament Idiom appeared before the most important of the recently discovered papyri had been published, so that no use could be made of this most instructive material, and yet that book contains so many trustworthy observations as to make it impossible any longer to ignore the morphological identity of the supposed "New Testament Idiom" with the Hellenistic colloquial language. The other recent New Testament Grammars also bring out the fact, and, from another point of view, so do Karl Dieterich's *Researches on the History of the Greek Language from the Hellenistic Period to the 10th Cent. A.D.*¹ Here we see the value of things that are often loftily despised as philological trifles: the overwhelming amount of small facts ascertained with absolute certainty has brought New Testament philology into such close connexion with the general study of late Greek as will never again be broken. R. Helbing's Septuagint Grammar has established the same organic connexion between Septuagint philology and the wider subject.

B. We quote one example from the special department of word-formation which may be called onomatology. The word Panthera, used as a man's name, is of great interest to New Testament scholars, though it is not found in the Bible. It appears in later traditions concerning the family of Jesus of Nazareth, and plays a great part particularly in the Jewish legends of the birth of Christ. A few years ago Häckel's unsuccessful foray in the domain of New Testament research¹ made the name familiar to a large public. Many scholars have bestowed their attention to it, and in almost every case they have concluded it to be a nickname specially invented for the purposes of Jewish polemics.² The problem as to the origin of this name can now be solved with certainty, thanks particularly to Latin inscriptions. The name Panthera is known in Attic inscriptions, but it occurs frequently in funeral and other inscriptions of the Imperial period as a cognomen of both men and women.³ Most interesting of all, perhaps, is the tombstone of *Tiberius Julius Abdes*⁴ Pantera, of Sidon in Phoenicia, a Roman archer at the very beginning of the Imperial period. It was found near Bingerbrück, and is now in the museum at Kreuznach (Fig. 5). Taken in conjunction with the other

⁴ Count Wolf Baudissin explained this Ebed name to me (by postcard, dated Berlin, 29 January, 1907) as אֶבֶד עִבְרָא servant of Isis. This is not the only example of Isis occurring among the Phoenicians. My attention was called by the same authority to the soldier's inscription at Ashmunên (Lidzbarski, Ephemeris für semitische Epigraphik 2. p. 338), Κορτίων Ἀβδέου, "Cottio the son of Abdes" (Ἀβδέης).

inscriptions, this epitaph¹ from the German frontier of the Roman Empire² shows with absolute certainty that Panthera was not an invention of Jewish scoffers, but a widespread name among the ancients.

C. Viewed in the light of the new documents the vocabulary of the New Testament also displays features characteristic of the Hellenistic colloquial language.

(a) With regard to the words themselves the proof of our thesis cannot in all cases be made out with the same completeness as in the phonology and accidence; but there is no need for absolute completeness here. It is obvious that the vocabulary of the international language, recruited from all the countries that had acknowledged the supremacy of Greek, can never be completely known to us in all its fulness. As a matter of fact words are constantly turning up in the newly discovered texts which one may seek in vain in the dictionaries. It is equally natural that many words can only be found a few times, sometimes only once, in the whole body of the texts known to us. Nobody with common sense will suppose that these were all coined by the writers on the spur of the moment: they are little discoveries for the lexicographer, it is true, but not inventions by the authors.³ Such little discoveries can be made, not a few, in the Greek Bible. The advocates of the theory of "Biblical" Greek have often made capital out of them. Cremer was especially fond of distinguishing these erratics as "Biblical" or "New Testament" words which were specially due to the power of Christianity to mould language. Even Grimm, in his edition of Wilke's Clavis Novi Testamenti, was always careful to mark the rarities as "vox solum biblica," "vox mere biblica," "vox profanis ignota," thus creating everywhere the impression that "Biblical Greek" could after all be discovered somehow by means of the lexicon.¹

In quite a number of cases, however, there are intrinsic reasons for saying at once: It is a mere accident of statistics that this word has been found hitherto only in the Bible. In other cases it is possible to prove directly from some neglected or newly discovered author, from inscriptions, ostraca, or papyri, that the word does after all belong to "profane," i.e. general Hellenistic, Greek. Such is the case, for instance, with the following supposed "Biblical" or "New Testament" words and combinations: ἀγάπη,² ἀκατάγνωστος, ἀντιλήμπτωρ, ἐλαιών, ἐνώπιον, εὐάρεστος, εὐίλατος, ἱερατεύω, καθαρίζω, κυριακός, λειτουργικός, λογεία, νεόφυτος, ὀφειλή, περιδέξιον, ἀπὸ πέρυσι, προσευχή, πυρράκης, σιτομέτριον, ἔναντι, φρεναπάτης.³

² Cf. the example now found by William H. P. Hatch, p. 18, n. 4 above. Wilhelm Crönert tells me (postcards, Göttingen, 26, 30 July, and 6 August, 1908) that he conjectures with great probability ἀγάπη in a MS. of Philodemus (90–40 B.C.) among the Herculean rolls at Naples. Details are reserved by him for later.

It will perhaps be objected, What are they among so many? What is this secularisation of 21 "Biblical" or "New Testament" words in comparison with the large number of cases in which no secular parallel has yet been found to characteristic peculiarities of the Greek Bible or New Testament? To this it must be replied that the number of specifically New Testament words at any rate has been enormously overestimated by all the statisticians.

The chief of those who have taken up this statistical problem in recent years is H. A. A. Kennedy; but he himself, as he tells me,¹ is no longer prepared to insist on his figures. Out of 4,829 New Testament words (excluding proper names and words derived therefrom) he formerly reckoned 580² or in round numbers 550³ to be "Biblical," i.e. "found either in the New Testament alone, or, besides, only in the Septuagint." These figures were no doubt obtained from the lists in Thayer's Lexicon. At the end of that volume we find, among other statistical information, a list of "Biblical, i.e. New Testament" words, 767 in number. From these, however, Thayer himself excepted 76 words as "late" (i.e. known to be used elsewhere) and 89 as doubtful, leaving 602. But if we subtract from 767 the total number of words (some 218) in the list which Thayer himself notes as occurring in Polybius, Plutarch, and elsewhere, there remain only 549. That is approximately Kennedy's number, and is certainly a considerable amount.

But now comes the surprise. Among the 550 remaining words we find first a number of proper names, then a quantity of Semitic and Latin transcriptions or borrowed words, then a series of numerals.¹ Finally, however, if we consult the excellent articles in the Lexicon itself, we shall find in the case of many of the words still remaining that there are quotations given from Josephus, Plutarch, Marcus Aurelius, etc. ! Thus, for example, out of 150 words enumerated by Kennedy² as occurring “only” in the Septuagint and the New Testament, 67 are quoted by Thayer himself from pagan authors ! The only excuse that I can see for the inaccuracy in these old statistics is that most of the authors quoted for the 67 words are later in date than the New Testament. But are we to regard words as specifically “New Testament” words because they happen to make their first appearance there ? Did Plutarch, for instance, borrow words from the Bible ? That is altogether improbable. The Bible and Plutarch borrow from a common source, viz. the vocabulary of late Greek.³

That there are such things as specifically “Biblical” and specifically “New Testament” (or rather, “early Christian”) words, I have never denied. No lengthy statistical investigations as to usage are necessary in order to recognise these special words : a glance is sufficient. But when a word is not recognisable at sight as a Jewish or Christian new formation, we must consider it as an ordinary Greek word until the contrary is proved.⁴ The number of really new-

coined words is in the oldest (New Testament) period very small. I estimate that in the whole New Testament vocabulary of nearly 5,000 words not many more than 50—fewer than that, more likely—will prove to be “Christian” or “Biblical” Greek words.¹ The great enriching of the Greek lexicon by Christianity did not take place till the later, ecclesiastical period, with its enormous development and differentiation of dogmatic, liturgical, and legal concepts. In the religiously creative period which came first of all the power of Christianity to form new words was not nearly so large as its effect in transforming the meaning of the old words.

As we have said, a close examination of the ancient literary texts² alone leads to the secularisation of many words in Thayer’s “Biblical” list, when it is agreed to drop the petty quibble that pagan authors of, say, the second century A.D. do not come into account. It is a weak point in Cremer’s Lexicon especially that “late” pagan parallels to New Testament words are apt to be treated with a certain contempt, whereas in reality the “late” parallels to the New Testament, which is itself “late,” are in commenting on Gal. i. 12, was quite wrong in saying that ἀποκάλυψις was a Biblical word, never employed by any of the world’s wise men. Cf. R. C. Trench, Synonyms of the New Testament, 7th ed., London, 1871, p. 333 (§ xciv).

¹ I therefore estimate the total of “Biblical” words in the New Testament as (at the utmost) 1 per cent. of the whole vocabulary. Kennedy (p. 93) estimated it at 12 per cent.

² The medical, astrological, and legal writers especially have not yet been thoroughly examined, and will prove very productive. Quite astonishing lexical parallels to the Bible are found, for instance, in a writer of whom I make repeated use later on in these pages, the astrologer Vettius Valens of Antioch, who wrote in the 2nd century A.D. Cf. Guilelmus Kroll, Mantissa Observationum Vettianarum (Excerptum ex Catalogo codicum astrologorum graecorum, t. V. p. ii.), Bruxelles, 1906, p. 152 ff. An edition of Vettius Valens by Kroll appeared recently: Vettii Valentis Anthologiarum libri, Berlin, 1908. Cf. the review by J. L. Heiberg, Deutsche Literaturzeitung, 29 (1908) col. 1764 ff.

much more instructive than the quotations from Homer or Plato.

The number of "Biblical" words shrinks, however, still further if we pursue the search among our non-literary texts. From the immemorial homes of Greek culture in Hellas and the islands, from the country towns of Asia Minor and the villages of Egypt no less than from the great centres of commerce on the Mediterranean and the Black Sea, year after year brings us new illustrations. Non-Christian texts are found containing words that were formerly—although "the kingdom of God is not in word"—thought to pertain exclusively to Primitive Christianity or the Old and New Greek Testaments.

In proof that the list given above¹ can already be largely increased I will here give a number of examples, beginning with 10 words which would assert their secularity at first glance, even if no quotations were forthcoming from extra-Biblical sources.

(1) The word ἀλλογενής, "of another race, a stranger, foreigner," found frequently in the Septuagint and once in the New Testament (Luke xvii. 18), is said by Cremer² and the other lexicographers to be "confined to Biblical and patristic Greek." The Roman authorities,³ however, in placing inscriptions on the marble barriers of the inner courts of the Temple at Jerusalem, thought differently of the word, or they would not have employed it in a notice

intended to be read by Gentiles, who were thereby threatened with death as the penalty for entering. One of these inscriptions was discovered by Clermont-Ganneau in 1871. The stone on which it is cut—a substantial block,¹ on which the eyes of Jesus and St. Paul² may often have rested—is now in the Imperial New Museum at Constantinople (Figure 6). The inscription³ is as follows:—

I inspected the stone on 10 and 11 April, 1906 (it was then in Chinili Kiosk), and it seemed to me that I could detect signs of the letters having been formerly painted. ⁴ The imperatival infinitive is common in edicts and notices (as in German). Cf. Bibelstudien, p. 260; Bible Studies, p. 344; and E. L. Hicks, The Collection of Ancient Greek Inscriptions in the British Museum, Part III. p. 176.

specifically Jewish word, it would not be easy to understand why he or his Greek revisers should have suppressed it. The fact probably is that, being an unliterary word of the people, it had to give way to the two other literary words in the pages of a writer who was aiming at elegance.

Even if the warning notice had been given its final form by the Jewish authorities, that would prove nothing against the view I have taken of this word. There is nothing whatever specifically Jewish about it either in sense or form.¹

(2) One can scarcely repress a smile on discovering in Thayer's "Biblical" list the word ὄνικός, "of or belonging to an ass," which seems anything but "Biblical" or "Christian," though it is true that oxen and asses are animals mentioned in the Bible, and the word was only known in Matt. xviii. 6 and Mark ix. 42 in the expression for "a millstone turned by an ass." We find the word, however, exactly in the time of Christ in a Fayûm contract for the loan of an ass, dated 8 February, 33 A.D.,² and again exactly in the time when the gospels were being written, in another Egyptian document relating to the sale of an ass, dated 5 February, 70 A.D.³ Moreover in the scale of taxes at Palmyra, recorded on stone in 136-137 A.D.,⁴ there is twice mention of a tax on an ass's burden of goods. The gospel word is thus given both a southern and an eastern setting, and is doubtless to be regarded as belonging to the colloquial language of every-day life. It survives in the Middle Greek τὸ (ὁ)νικόν, which is still in dialectal use, for instance in the island of Carpathus.¹

(3) βροχή, "a wetting, rain," is rightly described by Thayer in his article as a late word, but nevertheless isolated in his "Biblical" list. A lease among the Oxyrhynchus Papyri (No. 280), of the year 88-89 A.D., uses it to mean irrigation by the overflowing of the Nile.² This one quotation is enough to show that the word formed part of the living language. It is therefore quite justifiable to refer to its existence in Modern Greek.³ The present-day language has not taken the word from the Bible, but the Bible and Modern Greek have both drawn from one common source—the ancient colloquial language.

(4) κόκκινος, "scarlet," an adjective frequently occurring in the Greek Old and New Testaments, is included in Thayer's list of "Biblical" words, though a good deal of ingenuity would be needed to say why the Biblical language required this special expression. Thayer himself, however, gives quotations for the word from Plutarch and Epictetus⁴; he must have placed it in his exclusive list because he considered these two authors to be late, and almost post-Biblical. The occurrence of the word, therefore, in an older contemporary of the Septuagint that the papyri have restored to us, Herondas (vi. 19),¹ is not without importance.

(5) In astonishment at finding in Thayer's list of "Biblical" words ἐνδιδύσκω, "I put on," which, though it occurs in the Septuagint and the New Testament, is a perfectly colourless expression, in no way deserving this sacred isolation,² we turn to Thayer's article on the word and find at least one quotation from Josephus. As Josephus, however, was a Jew, and may therefore seem to border on the "Biblical,"³ we welcome an undoubted quotation from a profane source,⁴ and yet contemporary with the Septuagint, viz. an inscription from Delphi, circa 156-151 B.C.⁵

(6) ἱματίζω, "I clothe," seems no less worldly than the last word, which indeed it resembles in meaning; but because it was only known to occur in Mark v. 15 and Luke viii. 35 it appears in Thayer's "Biblical" list. The Primitive Christians, however, had no call to invent new terms connected with dress,⁶ and so this word is of course secular in origin. It is found in one of the pre-Christian Serapeum documents, 163 B.C.⁷; again later,⁸ a welcome parallel to the New "Testament," it occurs among the Oxyrhynchus

(7) ὀπτάνομαι, "I am seen, I let myself be seen," Acts i. 3, is in Thayer's list of "Biblical" words, although E. A. Sophocles⁴ had quoted it from the so-called Hermes Trismegistus.⁵ More important are the examples now known from two much older Ptolemaic papyri⁶ (Paris No. 49₃₃, circa 160 B.C.⁷; and Tebtunis No. 24₅, 117 B.C.⁸), which prove that the word was at any rate current in Egypt and explain the Septuagint usage (1 Kings viii. 8; Tobit xii. 19) in the most direct manner.

(8) ἐλλογέω, "I put down to some one's account, I reckon, impute," Philemon 18, Romans v. 13, is one of those words that have as worldly a look as possible. Thayer, however, in his "Biblical" list separates it off from all other Greek, although in his article on the word he quotes pagan inscriptions¹ containing it. A new² and earlier reference is supplied by a military diploma (imperial letter) on papyrus, written at Alexandria (?) in the time of Hadrian.³

(9) In defiance of the note "Inscr." appended to the word, περισσεία, "abundance, superfluity, surplus," also figures in Thayer's "Biblical" list. But the Thesaurus Graecae Linguae had already cited an inscription of the Imperial period from Sparta,⁴ which is also referred to by Grimm and Thayer. A further addition is now an inscription of 329 A.D. from Rakhlé in Syria.⁵

(10) "Never in profane writers," say Grimm⁶ and others of ἀναστατόω, "I incite to tumult, stir up to sedition, unsettle," another Septuagint and New Testament word which at first sight certainly has nothing Biblical or Christian about it, but seems altogether profane. Cremer,⁷ however, gives from the Thesaurus Graecae Linguae at least one quotation from Harpocraton, a profane writer of the fourth⁸ century A.D. But, as Nägeli¹ pointed out, we find at any rate the word ἐξαναστατόω in a fragment of an anthology written about 100 B.C. (Tebtunis Papyri No. 2). Still more valuable is a passage in an Egyptian letter of 4 August, 41 A.D. (Berliner Griechische Papyrusurkunden, No. 1079_{20 f.}²), where the word probably means the same as in the bad boy's letter among the Oxyrhynchus Papyri (No. 119₁₀), of the second or third century A.D.³ The Paris Magical Papyrus I.2243f. also contains the word, in a good sense.⁴ We are therefore undoubtedly entitled to reckon it as part of the general secular vocabulary.

I now add to these examples 22 words (nos. 11-32) which in some way or other approach more closely to the domain of religion and ethics, so that it was at least not impossible from the first that they might be peculiar to the Bible.

(11) ἀφιλάργυρος, "not covetous" (1 Tim. iii. 3; Hebrews xiii. 5), has been stated to be a "New Testament word only," and one might suppose it to be really Christian when one remembers how the Gospel is always antagonistic to mammon. But Nägeli⁵ has already quoted (besides certain authors that had been overlooked) an inscription from Athens 36-35 B.C.,⁶ another from Istropolis, first century B.C.,⁷ and a papyrus (Oxyrhynchus No. 33 verso, II₁₁) of the second century A.D., in which either ἀφιλάργυρος or ἀφιλαργύρως occurs.¹ To these may now be added a still earlier quotation for the adjective from an inscription at Priene (No. 137₅), probably of the second century B.C.

(12) πληροφορέω, "I carry full, make full, fulfil," is according to Cremer² found "only in Biblical and patristic Greek; elsewhere not till very late." The earliest example hitherto discovered is in the Septuagint, Ecclesiastes viii. 11. The papyri,³ however, show that this word, which occurs frequently in the New Testament, was at any rate used in Egypt at the same period and immediately afterwards. The earliest passages are: a letter from the Fayûm, now at Berlin, first century A.D.⁴; an Amherst papyrus, of 124 A.D.⁵; a Berlin papyrus, of 139 A.D.⁶; an Oxyrhynchus papyrus, of the end of the second century A.D.⁷ If these Egyptian quotations are not sufficient, the astrologer Vettius Valens of Antioch, a contemporary of the last two, can help to increase the statistics.¹ Considering the undoubted rarity of the word a later quotation in a "profane" context is also worthy of note: in an inscription of the eighth century A.D. from Nicaea in Bithynia² the verb is used of the completion of a tower.

(13) συναντιλαμβάνομαι, "I take interest in (a thing) along with (others), take my share in, assist jointly," was first known to occur in the Septuagint. It occurs twice also in the New Testament, Luke x. 40 and Romans viii. 26, in the latter passage referring to the mediation of the Holy Spirit. Though it is used by the pre-Christian writer Diodorus of Sicily, and by Josephus,³ it is included by Thayer in his "Biblical" list, with the note "Inscr." appended, but without any quotation from inscriptions. We can trace the word, however, throughout the whole extent of the Hellenistic world of the Mediterranean. An inscription of the year 270 B.C. on the retaining-wall of the temple of Apollo at Delphi⁴ construes it with the genitive, an inscription of Pergamum between 263 and 241 B.C.⁵ with εἰς, a papyrus letter from Hibeh in Egypt circa 238 B.C. with περί.⁶ Then comes the Septuagint, with various constructions¹; the Sicilian follows, with the genitive,² while St. Luke and St. Paul use the word with the dative. These statistics are absolutely comprehensive geographically. Thus the word which, in the absence of proper evidence, was consigned to isolation, but which is in fact known to have been used at Delphi, in Asia, in Egypt, and by a Sicilian writer, might now serve as a school example of the unity and uniformity of the international Greek vocabulary.

(14) St. Paul in Philippians ii. 30 testifies of Epaphroditus that he had for the sake of the work of Christ come nigh unto death, having daringly exposed himself.³ The verb παραβολεύομαι, "I expose myself," here used in the aorist participle, has not been found in other writers, and was even in ancient times such a rare word that some copyists have altered it.⁴ Nevertheless, though placed by Thayer in his list, it is not a "Biblical" peculiarity. An inscription at Olbia on the Black Sea, probably of the 2nd cent. A.D.,⁵ in honour of a certain Carzoazus

Latyshev considers this a very obscure text (p. 54). I find not the least difficulty, if μέχρι (ἕως?) περάτων is right: "but also to the ends of the world it was witnessed of him that in the interests of friendship he had exposed himself to dangers as an advocate in (legal) strife (by taking his clients' causes even) up to emperors." παραβολευσάμενος governs the accusative τοὺς κινδύνους (cf. παραβάλλεσθαι τὸν κίνδυνον, Thuc. iii. 14, quoted in Pape's Lexicon) and the dative συμμαχία (cf. τῇ ψυχῇ in the passage from St. Paul, and ψυχῇ καὶ σ[ώ]ματι παραβαλλόμενος, inscription from the coast of the Black Sea, circa 48 A.D., Dittenberger, Sylloge,² No. 342₃; literary passages in Thayer, s.v. παραβολεύομαι, and J. H. Moulton, Grammar, I. p. 64). Hence, "by his advocacy he exposed himself to dangers." The whole passage has a the son of Attalus, employs exactly the same principle in a similar context, and helps to elucidate the passage in Philippians, while itself receiving illumination from the New Testament.

(15) In 1 Tim. ii. 12 the woman is forbidden to "have dominion over" the man. The word αὐθεντέω appears here for the first time in Greek literature, nor does it occur again except in ecclesiastical writers. Of course, therefore, it has been described as "only Biblical and patristic."¹ Now, as Nägeli² points out, the word is twice used³ in a non-literary text, viz. a Christian papyrus letter of the 6th or 7th cent. A.D., No. 103 among the Berlin documents. A superficial observer will say this is a new proof that the verb is Christian. As a matter of fact its occurrence in the letter is much rather an indication of its popular character. And all doubt is removed by Moeris,⁴ one of the late lexicographers among the ancients, who gives αὐτοδικεῖν as the Attic and αὐθεντεῖν as the corresponding Hellenistic word (in the Κοινή). In the same way Thomas Magister⁵ warns against the use of αὐθεντεῖν as vulgar, and recommends αὐτοδικεῖν instead.⁶ It is therefore very "New Testament" ring. The ancient phrase πέρατα τῆς γῆς is also familiar to us from the Greek Bible. For the actual hyperbola itself cf. for instance the amiable exaggeration in Romans i. 8 and the emphatic expressions in Romans xv. 19. The use of μαρτυρέομαι is quite as in the New Testament (Neue Bibelstudien, p. 93; Bible Studies, p. 265).—In the Theologische Rundschau, 9 (1906) p. 223, I quoted the inscription from van Herwerden, Lexicon, p. 622, unfortunately with his error in the reference: II. (instead of I.).

probably a mere statistical accident that αἰθεντέω has not been met with earlier than in the New Testament; any day may bring us an ancient "profane" quotation.

(16) διαταγή, "disposition, ordinance" (Ezra iv. 11; Rom. xiii. 2; Acts vii. 53) is said to be "purely" Biblical and patristic: the "Greeks" use instead διάταξις.¹ Nevertheless E. A. Sophocles² noted the word in Ruphus of Ephesus,³ a physician who flourished about 100 A.D. (so that he may well have been a contemporary of the physician St. Luke). That this pagan physician should have picked up the word from the Christians is, I think, more improbable than that St. Paul and the Christian physician St. Luke knew it from its use among their medical contemporaries—if it was not known to them naturally apart from that. And in all probability it was so known to them. The word is not merely a technical term in medicine: the astrologer Vettius Valens of Antioch, of the 2nd cent. A.D., also uses it.⁴

The inscriptions and papyri add their light. Nägeli⁵ quotes inscriptions from Sardis⁶ (Roman period), and Pergamum⁷ (date uncertain), and docu-

A.D.³ from the Fayûm, an inscription from Irbid in the Hauran (238-239 A.D.),⁴ an inscription from Hierapolis⁵ (2nd? cent. A.D.), and an inscription from Oenoanda in the south-west of Asia Minor (Imperial period).⁶ Of still greater importance, if rightly restored, is an inscription from Antiphellus⁷ in Lycia (2nd? cent. A.D.), in which G. Hirschfeld (rightly, I think) explains τῶν θείων δια[ταγ]ῶν as "imperial ordinances."⁸ This would be a most exact parallel to the celebrated passage in the Epistle to the Romans, which also refers to the Roman authorities.

Walther Judeich (ibid. p. 110) points out that in this and related inscriptions from Asia Minor διατάσσεσθαι, διάταξις, διάταγμα, and διαταγή display the specialised meaning of "determine by testamentary disposition," etc., just like διατίθεσθαι, etc. This use was also known to St. Paul: his ἐπιδιατάσσεσθαι (Gal. iii. 15) also refers to a testament.

servation already hinted above: we see unity and uniformity prevailing in the use of words wherever the international language was written. A supposed Biblical word can be traced in the Imperial period from one stage to another through the countries bordering on the Mediterranean: from Pergamum, Sardis, Ephesus, Hierapolis, by way of Oenoanda, Lycia, and Cilicia (St. Paul), to Antioch, the Hauran, and the little country towns of Egypt. And in Egypt we found what is at present the oldest example of all, the Septuagint Ezra iv. 11.

(17) πρωτότοκος, "firstborn," occurs frequently in the Septuagint and in important religious utterances of the New Testament. Thayer quotes it twice from the Anthology, but nevertheless leaves it in his list of "Biblical" words. It is of some importance therefore to find in Trachonitis, on the undated tomb of a pagan "high priest" and "friend of the gods," a metrical inscription, mutilated indeed, but plainly showing this word.¹ It is noteworthy that we have here, as in the Anthology, a poetical text. Another metrical epitaph from Rome,² Christian, and not much later than the second (?) or third century, uses the word with reference to a firstborn "sun-child" (i.e. child born on a Sunday) who died at the age of two years.

(18) συγκληρονόμος, "fellow-heir," is "unknown in profane Greek" according to Cremer.³ He has just quoted Philo the Jew, who uses the word once, ¹ Epigrammata Graeca ex lapidibus collecta ed. Georgius Kaibel, Berolini, 1878, No. 460, ἱεὺς γάρ εἰμι πρωτοτόκων ἐκ τελεθ[ῶν] ? (= τελετ[ῶν] ?), "for I am a priest by the rites of the firstborn." Kaibel thinks that in the family of the deceased the firstborn always exercised the office of priest. Cf. van Herwerden, Lexicon, p. 710. [Cf. Pindar, Ol. x. so we must suppose Cremer to be as broad-minded as the early Church in approximating Philo to Christianity. But even in quite pagan surroundings we encounter this word, the origin of which in the legal terminology of the day is patent on the face of it. In an Ephesian inscription of the Imperial period¹ one C. Umphuleius Bassus mentions "Eutycheis as coheir." If this woman was his wife, as is probable, this example is a specially fine illustration of 1 Peter iii. 7, where the wife is honoured as being (spiritually) a fellow-heir with her husband.

(19) The word δικαιοκρισία "is found only in ecclesiastical and Biblical Greek, and that rarely," says Cremer. This time it is interesting to notice that Cremer² has tolerantly admitted to Biblical (or ecclesiastical?) precincts the Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs, in which the word twice occurs.³ Now on the fourth of the month Phamenoth, in the year 303 A.D., a certain Aurelius Demetrius Nilus, a former arch-priest of Arsinoë and undoubtedly a heathen, caused a petition to be written (for he could not write himself⁴!) to the Praefect of Egypt, Clodius Culcianus, who is known to us from the time of the Diocletian persecution. The petitioner appealed confidently, "being of good hope to obtain righteous judgment from thy Magnificence."⁵ In this passage the word δικαιοκρισία stands really for that which is the outcome of just judgment, viz. "a just sentence." In Romans ii. 5 the radical meaning, "just judgment,"¹ suffices, and Cremer's discrimination between "judgment which does justice" and "judgment in accordance with justice" is doubtless too fine.

(20) The word κατήγωρ, "accuser," is probably still regarded by most commentators on Rev. xii. 10 as a Biblical speciality traceable to a Hebrew² or Aramaic³ adaptation of the Greek κατήγορος. The question why κατήγορος is always used elsewhere in the New Testament is either not raised at all or tacitly answered by reference to the supposed strongly Hebrew character of the Revelation. We find the word, however, in a very vulgar magical formula in a British Museum papyrus (No. 124) of the fourth or fifth century A.D., where it refers not to the devil, as in the Biblical passage, but to human enemies.⁴ The papyrus itself is late; the formula, however, to judge by the analogy of other magical prescriptions, is older; and, in spite of the strongly syncretic character of the papyrus, there is nothing which points to a Jewish or Christian origin for this formula.⁵ The only thing that can be ascertained Chapter IV below, p. 308, n. 5) to mean that the enemy's senses will be paralysed. [Eduard Norden, letter, Gross-Lichterfelde W., 3 September, 1908, makes the excellent suggestion to delete the third καὶ. The translation will then be "fears of robbers" instead of "robbers and terrors."] with certainty is the vulgar character of the formula, and the word κατήγωρ is also—as in the vulgar Greek Revelation of St. John—a vulgarism.

The philologists who have discussed the word recently¹ are doubtless on the right track: κατήγωρ is a vulgar “back formation” from the genitive plural κατηγόρων, on the analogy of ρήτόρων. Nearly all of them² quote, among numerous vulgar formations of the same kind, the word διάκων (= διάκονος), and refer to the Charta Borgiana (191–192 A.D.) for the earliest example of its use. The phenomenon in general is very old,³ and in this special case a much earlier example can be quoted: a papyrus letter from the Fayûm, dated 4 December, 75 A.D., and now at Berlin, has the dative τῶι διάκωνι.⁴ It is therefore impossible to call διάκων “late,” as Blass even did⁵; or at least it is impossible in a New Testament Grammar, for this example is no doubt older than the Revelation.

(21) With regard to κατάκρισις, “condemnation,” Cremer⁶ expresses himself somewhat more cautiously: “a word that appears to be found only in Biblical and ecclesiastical Greek.” The appearance, however, was deceptive. Christianity had no more need of a special word for "condemnation"¹ than it has call to be jealous in claiming the sole possession of words for "a curse," "to curse," and "cursed."² The "Biblical" word³ κατάκρισις is found more than once in the astrologer Vettius Valens of Antioch (second century A.D.).⁴

(22) ἀναθεματίζω, "I curse," literally "I devote (to the lower world)"⁵—there was surely no reason for the Bible religion to be particularly proud of having invented such a word, and yet according to Cremer⁶ and other lexicographers it is found "only in Biblical and ecclesiastical Greek." Among the ancient lead tablets published and discussed by Richard Wünsch in the preface to his collection of Attic cursing-tablets⁷ we find, however, one of the first or second century A.D., a heathen curse from Megara, now in the Royal Museum at Berlin, which throws a new light on the words ἀνάθεμα and ἀναθεματίζω. At the end of the whole formula there is a separate line of large letters⁸ making up the word ANEΘEMA, which is obviously a form of conclusion—"curse!"

We find further in line 5 f. ἀναθεματίζ[ομ]εν αὐτούς, in line 8 f. τούτους ἀναθεμα[τί]ζομεν, and on the back, line 8 f., ἀναθεματί[ζ]ομεν τούτο[υς]: “we curse them,” three times over. We must therefore say that ἀνάθεμα, meaning “curse,” belonged also to the pagan vocabulary, and that ἀναθεματίζω will have to be removed from the list of merely “Biblical” or “ecclesiastical” words. We may still reckon with the possibility that the verb was first coined by Greek Jews: technical expressions in magic are of all places the most likely in which to assume that the international language had been influenced by Judaism.

(23) The classical Greek for “cursed” is ἄρατος, ἐπάρατος, or κατάρατος. In the Septuagint we find κατάρατος rarely, but a fourth word, ἐπικατάρατος, occurs frequently. As it was met with elsewhere “only” in the New Testament, it has been reckoned among the words that are “only” Biblical and ecclesiastical,¹—as though Christianity had any need to plume itself on the possession of this special word. But why the secular words were not sufficient, and how far a “Biblical” distinction was secured by the ἐπί prefixed, these questions have never been raised. From the point of view of historical grammar the correct thing would have been to assume ἐπικαταράομαι and ἐπικατάρατος to be instances of those double compounds or “decomposites”² which become more and more common in later Greek, and to regard ἐπί, therefore, as a late Greek, not a Biblical, feature. We are therefore not surprised to find the adjective used in a pagan inscription from Euboea³ of the second century A.D.¹ The inscription must be pagan, for the Erinyes, Charis, and Hygeia are named in it as goddesses. If it should be thought, on account of the Septuagint formulae occurring in this inscription,² that Septuagint influence might account for ἐπικατάρατος,³ we can refer to a pagan inscription from Halicarnassus, of the second or third century A.D., now in the British Museum.⁴

(24) νεκρώω, "I make dead, mortify," is one of the "Biblical" words that Thayer even in his list secularises by reference to Plutarch, the Anthology, and inscriptions. In his article on the word he adds to these Epictetus and Marcus Aurelius, but he nowhere actually cites an inscription. He may have been thinking of the metrical epitaph of one M. Aurelius Eutychus (Athens, Roman period),⁵ which employs the phrase "body deceased" or "dead body" and thus furnishes an excellent parallel to Rom. iv. 19.

(25) ἀναζάω, "I live again, revive," which occurs several times in the New Testament, is regarded by

³ Nägeli, who quotes this inscription (p. 60), is so cautious as to make this suggestion. It must be noted, however, that the extremely numerous ἐπικατάρατος passages in the Septuagint never employ the formula of the inscription, ἐπικατάρατος ὅστις. If the word were taken over from the Septuagint we should expect in this case the construction also to be borrowed.

Grimm, Thayer,¹ and Cremer as specifically a New Testament and ecclesiastical word. Cremer² even explains why Christianity had to invent the word: “the ἀναβιβῶναι of profane Greek does not suit the soteriological sense of the Biblical ζωή.”

Without raising the question why, if that were so, it was not necessary to find a substitute for the secular substantive ζωή, we are able in the first place to quote from Nicander,³ a poet of the second century B.C., at least the verb ἀναζώω, which the lexicons describe as a poetical form of ἀναζάω. We find the Biblical word, however, in Sotion,⁴ a narrator of marvels who possibly belongs to the first century A.D.,⁵ and again in Artemidorus,⁶ an interpreter of dreams in the second century A.D. A Cretan inscription⁷ of unascertained date, which moreover requires restoration, was referred to by Nägeli.⁸ In the fifth century we still find the word ἀναζάω used in a physical sense, as in the above-quoted passages, by the Christian writer Nilus¹; and the late lexicographers of antiquity, quoted by Nägeli, now supplemented by the newly discovered fragment of Photius,² give it as a synonym for ἀναβιώσκομαι and ἀναβιώω.

Our conclusion, therefore, must be this: ἀναζάω, "I live again," is an international Greek word, and its radical (physical) meaning, which can be traced through many centuries, has been hallowed and given an ethical content by Christianity. Cremer's theory would reverse all this, and we should have to deplore the profanation of a "Christian" word.

(26) εὐπροσωπέω, "I look well, make a fair show" (Gal. vi. 12; and as a variant in the hexaplaric text³ of Psalm cxl. [cxli.] 6), is described by Cremer⁴ as "not discoverable in profane Greek." We find it, however, in the letter of the Egyptian Polemon to his "brother" Menches (114 B.C.),⁵ clearly used no longer in the physical sense,⁶ but (as by St. Paul) with reference to winning the good opinion of one's neighbours.

(27) When St. Paul preached as a missionary in Athens he was suspected by Stoic and Epicurean opponents of being "a setter forth of strange gods: because he preached Jesus and Anastasis." The word καταγγελεύς, "proclaimer, herald, setter forth," here placed in the mouth of the pagan philosophers, is according to Cremer¹ and others only found in this passage "and in ecclesiastical Greek." Even if no quotations were forthcoming from profane sources, this isolation of the word would for intrinsic reasons be highly questionable; for although the sentence containing it is in the Bible, it is not a "Biblical" but a pagan utterance, emanating from the pagan opposition, and of its authenticity Cremer can have had no doubt. A less hasty examination would have led to the recognition of the word as pagan on internal grounds. As a matter of fact it is found on a marble stele recording a decree of the Mytilenians in honour of the Emperor Augustus (between 27 and 11 B.C.).²

(28) In the First Epistle of St. Peter v. 3 f. we read³: "... making yourselves ensamples to the flock. And when the chief Shepherd shall appear, ye shall receive the crown of glory that fadeth not away."

The "chief Shepherd" of course is Jesus; the corresponding Greek word, ἀρχιποίμην, is according to Cremer⁴ unknown except in this passage. One is tempted to regard it as a Christian invention; some people, I daresay, detect a sort of official ring in the word. It is possible, however, to show that the apostle, far from inventing the word, was merely borrowing. A slip of wood (Figure 7) that once hung round the neck of an Egyptian mummy, of the Roman period, has been found with the following Greek inscription,¹ designed to establish the identity of the deceased :—

τερος ἀρχιποίμενος. ἐβίω-σεν ἐτῶν . . .

Plenis the younger, chief shepherd's. Lived . . . years.

The genitive here, "chief shepherd's," is probably a mere slip in writing, but the occurrence of such a slip is of some interest. Had the deceased been a person of distinction the inscription would have been more carefully executed. This label was hurriedly written for a man of the people, for an Egyptian peasant who had served as overseer of, let us say, two or three shepherds, or perhaps even half a dozen.² If a reading of Carl Wessely's³ may be trusted, we have the same title again on another mummy-label;⁴ but I believe from the facsimile that the word is not really there.⁵ The one instance, however, is enough: it shows "chief shepherd" to have been a title in genuine use among the people. Moreover, the Thesaurus Graecae Linguae had already quoted the word from the Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs.¹ The Christians called their Saviour "the chief Shepherd," but this was not crowning Him with jewelled diadem of gold: it was more like plaiting a wreath of simple green leaves to adorn His brow.

(29) προσκυνητής, "a worshipper," is according to Cremer² "unknown in pre-Christian Greek, and very rare afterwards, e.g. in inscriptions." Which inscriptions are meant, is not stated. The plural "inscriptions" is no doubt traceable to Passow or Pape s.v., where "Inscr." certainly means "Inscriptions," though the plural must not be pressed. As a matter of fact the only inscription of which these lexicographers could have had knowledge must have been one of the third century A.D. from Baetocaece, near Apamea in Syria, reprinted from Chandler in the Corpus Inscriptionum Graecarum (No. 4474₆₁), so that Cremer's statement would seem to be about right.

In the addenda,³ however, he informs us that "the word was not entirely unknown in pre-Christian Greek," and quotes an inscription (Waddington 3, 2720a) from the same place in Syria containing a decree⁴ drawn up in the interests of "the worshippers that come up"⁵ and communicated to the Emperor Augustus.

⁵ Τοῖς ἀνιούσει (sic; Cremer has ἀνιούσι) προσκυνηταῖς.

This inscription, however, is identical with the one referred to above; it has been repeatedly discussed of late.¹ Though carved in the third century this example of the use of προσκυνητής is really pre-Christian; the inscription in fact includes older documents: a letter of a King Antiochus, and the old decree that was sent to Augustus.

Other examples are at present unknown to me. I know no foundation for van Herwerden's statement,² that the word is frequent in inscriptions and papyri.

(30) προσκαρτέρησις, "perseverance, constancy," which the lexicons hitherto have quoted only from Eph. vi. 18, is strangely enough described by Cremer³ not as Biblical but as a "late" Greek word. This is because he here follows Pape, who marks the word as "late" though he certainly can have known no example of its use outside the Bible. Thayer includes the word in his "Biblical" list. It can now be quoted from two Jewish manumissions recorded in inscriptions at Panticapaeum on the Black Sea, one⁴ belonging to the year 81 A.D., and the other⁵ nearly as old. These inscriptions, I admit, will not do more than disprove the supposed "Biblical" peculiarity of the word. For the present there is still the possibility that προσκαρτέρησις was a Jewish coinage of the Diaspora.

Schürer, Geschichte des jüdischen Volkes, III.³ p. 53, points to the analogy between this inscription and the usage, striking by its frequency in the New Testament, of combining the verb προσκαρτερέω with προσευχή (meaning "prayer": it could hardly be "place of prayer").

(31) The Greek word used for the veil or curtain that separated the Holy Place from the Holy of Holies in the Temple at Jerusalem is καταπέτασμα, literally "that which is spread out downwards, that which hangs down." That this word should be found in Thayer's "Biblical" list is not in itself surprising, for the idea before us is a technical one, connected with the apparatus of worship. The occurrence of the word in the Epistle of Aristee, in Philo and Josephus, would not affect the case, for these writers knew the word from the Septuagint. Nevertheless it cannot be that we have here to do with a Biblical or Judaeo-Christian¹ speciality, created by the Septuagint. An inscription from Samos, 346-5 B.C.,² cataloguing the furniture of the temple of Hera, furnishes an example which is a century earlier, and particularly valuable because it shows the word employed in a religious context and incidentally corrects the description "Alexandrian"³ with which the lexicons had mechanically labelled it.

(32) ἐπισυναγωγή, found only in 2 Macc. ii. 7, 2 Thess. ii. 1, and Heb. x. 25, where it denotes various senses of the word "assembly," is according to Cremer⁴ "unknown in profane Greek." As συναγωγή itself was originally a profane word, one is inclined to ask why ἐπισυναγωγή should be different, especially as the profane συναγωγή became among the Jews (and occasionally among the Christians) the technical expression for the (assembled) congregation and the house in which they met. As a matter of fact a mere statistical accident was the cause of error here, and a second accident has very happily corrected the first. In the island of Syme, off the coast of Caria, there was lately discovered, built into the altar of the chapel of St. Michael Tharrinos, the upper portion of a stele inscribed with a decree in honour of a deserving citizen.¹ The writing is considered to be not later than 100 B.C., so that the inscription is probably older than the Second Book of Maccabees. By the kind permission of the Imperial Austrian Archaeological Institute I am able to reproduce here (Figure 8) a facsimile of the whole stele (including the portion previously discovered).

On the upper fragment of this stele we find our word in the general meaning of "collection"²; the difference between it and the common συναγωγή is scarcely greater than between, say, the English "collecting" and "collecting together"³: the longer Greek word was probably more to the taste of the later period.

The stone which has established the secular character of this Bible word—the heathen stone of Syme built into the altar of the Christian chapel of St. Michael—may be taken as symbolical. It will remind us that in the vocabulary of our sacred Book there is embedded material derived from the language of the surrounding world.

Even without the stone we could have learnt the special lesson, for the Thesaurus Graecae Linguae had already registered the word in the geographer Ptolemy and in the title of the third book of Artemidorus, the interpreter of dreams, both of the 2nd century A.D., and later in Proclus. Such “post-Christian” “late” passages, however, generally fail to impress the followers of Cremer’s method, and therefore the pre-Christian, and (if importance be attached to the book) pre-Maccabean inscription is very welcome.

In the above examples it has often happened that the secularisation of a “Biblical” word has been effected by more than one solitary quotation, e.g. from a papyrus; again and again we have seen such words occurring outside the Bible in secular uses both in Egypt and also in Asia Minor.¹ This uniformity (or we might say, these real Κοινή characteristics) in the vocabulary of the Κοινή—an observation of some importance to our total estimate of international Greek—may now in conclusion receive further illustration from certain new discoveries relating to the curious word λογεία (λογία),² “a (charitable) collection," which I have already dealt with elsewhere.¹

This word, occurring "only" in 1 Cor. xvi. 1, 2, has been given a false etymology² and has sometimes even been regarded as an invention of St. Paul's.³ The etymology, however, is now definitely ascertained: it comes from λογέω, "I collect," a verb which, like the derivate, was found for the first time comparatively recently in papyri, ostraca, and inscriptions⁴ from Egypt and elsewhere. We find it used chiefly of religious⁵ collections for a god, a temple, etc., just as St. Paul uses it of his collection of money⁶ for the "saints" at Jerusalem. Out of the large number of new examples from Egypt⁷ I select an ostrakon which comes very near in date to the First Epistle to the Corinthians. It was written on 4 August, 63 A.D., discovered at Thebes in Egypt,⁸ and is now in the Berlin Museum.⁹ For the photograph

⁶ A most grotesque theory was put forward as late as 1897 by Linke in the Festschrift für Professor D. Fricke (cf. Theol. Literaturblatt, 19 [1898] col. 121). He suggests that the "great logia" in the field of St. Paul's missionary labours was not a collection of money but a determination of the forms of doctrine and liturgical formulations that had arisen within the churches through special gifts of the Spirit. St. Paul, he thinks, wishes to obtain the results of the thought and prayer, revelations and spiritual hymns of each single church in the course of an ecclesiastical year. The parallel to the modern German system of church returns is so close that one wonders almost at the omission of statistics of mixed marriages!

Beyond the numerous instances of the use of the word in Egypt, the only witness for the word in Asia Minor was St. Paul. Inscriptions now forthcoming from Asia Minor are therefore a very welcome addition to the statistics. A marble tablet of about the first century A.D., found at Smyrna,¹⁰ enumerates among the votive gifts presented by a benefactor of the god and the city "a gilded and . . . key for the collection and procession of the gods." In this instance, not far removed in date from the First Epistle to the Corinthians, the word is used in a sacred connexion, but the oldest example from Asia Minor hitherto known no doubt refers to secular matters.¹ A limestone slab, found at Magnesia on the Maeander, and now at Berlin, is inscribed with the award of the people of Magnesia in a dispute between Hierapytna and Itanus in the year 138 or 132 B.C.² By the kind permission of the Museum authorities at Berlin I am enabled to give here a reduced reproduction of Kern's facsimile³ (Fig. 10). Taken together with the poor Egyptian potsherd given as a receipt to the country labourer Pibuchis, this official inscription from Magnesia (a duplicate of which has been found in Crete⁴) shows, like the inscription from Smyrna, that the remarkable word used by St. Paul in corresponding with the Corinthian Christians was common to all grades of the international language.

A considerable number of "Biblical" words having thus been brought into proper historical alignment, it is scarcely necessary to enter into proofs that many words hitherto described as "rare" in the New Testament are authenticated by the new texts.⁵

The harvest here is of course equally great in proportion, and obtained with less trouble than in the first group.

(b) As regards the meanings of words our knowledge has also been largely increased. I have already remarked (p. 73 above) that the influence of Primitive Christianity was far more powerful to transform words, i.e. to create new meanings, than to create new words. But here again there has often been great exaggeration in the statement of the facts. Cremer especially had a tendency to increase as much as possible the number of specifically "Biblical" or "New Testament" meanings of words common to all Greek; and in exegetical literature, when dogmatic positions of the schools are to be defended, a favourite device is to assume "Biblical" or "New Testament" meanings. The texts that are now forthcoming from the world contemporary with the New Testament serve, however, to generalise not a few of these specialities, e.g. the use of ἀδελφός ("brother") for the members of a community, ἀναστρέφομαι ("I live") and ἀναστροφή ("manner of life"; "conversation," A.V.) in an ethical sense,¹ ἀντίληψις ("help"), λειτουργέω ("I act in the public service") and λειτουργία ("public service") in a sacral sense, ἐπιθυμητής ("desiring") in a bad sense, λούω ("I wash") in a sacral sense, πάροικος ("sojourner"), etc. etc.²

But there are other ways in which not unfrequently the familiar words of the New Testament acquire a new light. A new choice of meanings presents itself, changing, it may be, the inner meaning of the sacred text more or less decidedly, disclosing the manifold interpretations of the gospel that were possible to the men of old, illuminating in both directions, backward and forward, the history of the meaning of words.

Let us look at a few examples.

(1) When Jesus sent forth His apostles for the first time He said to them¹ (Matt. x. 8 ff.) :—

“Freely ye received, freely give. Get you no gold, nor silver, nor brass in your purses (margin : girdles) : no wallet for your journey . . . ” (R.V.).

Or, as it is reported by St. Mark (vi. 8) :—

And thus in St. Luke (ix. 3 ; cf. x. 4 and xxii. 35 f.) :—

One of the characteristic utterances of Jesus has here been handed down, not without variations, but still in such form that the original can be discerned beneath them : the apostles were told to take with them for their journey only the barest necessities,² among which was to be reckoned neither money nor bread. According to St. Matthew’s report they were further forbidden even to earn money on their way, as they might have done by working miracles of healing, etc. The meaning of the “ wallet ” (A.V. “ scrip ”) has seldom been questioned, because it seems so obvious : most commentators probably think of it as a travelling-bag,¹ or, more precisely defined, as a bread-bag. The word in the original Greek, πήρα, is capable of either meaning, according to circumstances. In the context "travelling-bag" would do very well; "bread-bag" not so well, being superfluous after the mention of "bread," and tautology seems out of place in these brief, pointed commands given by Jesus. But there is a special meaning, suggested by one of the monuments, which suits the context at least as well as the more general sense of "bag" or "travelling-bag." The monument in question was erected in the Roman Imperial period at Kefr-Hauar in Syria by a person who calls himself, in the Greek inscription, a "slave" of the Syrian goddess. "Sent by the lady," as he says himself, this heathen apostle tells of the journeys on which he went begging for the "lady" and boasts triumphantly that "each journey brought in seventy bags."² The word here employed is πήρα. Of course it has nothing to do with well-filled provision-bags for the journey: it clearly means the beggar's collecting-bag.³ The same special meaning

³ [Wallet, then, is just the right word in English. Cf. Shakespeare, Troilus and Cressida, III. iii. 145, "Time hath, my lord, a wallet at his back, Wherein he puts alms for oblivion." A writer in Notes and Queries, 7th Ser., iv. 78, points out that the triangular piece of stuff, like a bag, which hangs from behind the left shoulder of a junior barrister's gown was originally a wallet to receive fees.—There is an illustration of the ancient wallet in Anthony Rich's Dict. of Roman and Greek Antiquities, s.v. "Pera." TR.]

would make excellent sense in our text, particularly in St. Matthew's version: there is to be no earning, and also no begging of money. With this possible explanation of the word πήρα the divine simplicity of Jesus stands out afresh against the background suggested by the heathen inscription. While Christianity was still young the beggar-priest was making his rounds in the land of Syria on behalf of the national goddess. The caravan conveying the pious robber's booty to the shrine lengthens as he passes from village to village, and assuredly the lady will not forget her slave. In the same age and country One who had not where to lay His head sent forth His apostles, saying:—

“Freely ye received, freely give. Get you no gold, nor silver, nor brass in your purses: no wallet for your journey.”

(2) Among the sayings of our Lord we find thrice repeated the phrase “They have their reward,” e.g. in Matt. vi. 2 of the hypocrites who sound a trumpet before them when they do their alms. The Greek word translated “have” (A.V.), or preferably (with the Revisers) “have received,” is ἀπέχω, “I have or receive in full,” “I have got.” Reward is spoken of in the passage immediately preceding, but there the simple verb ἔχω is used. I have long held¹ that the word ἀπέχω is explainable by the papyri and ostraca. In countless instances we find the word in these texts² in a meaning that suits admirably our Lord's saying about rewards, viz. “I have received,” a technical expression regularly employed in drawing up a receipt. Compare, for instance, two ostraca from Thebes figured in this book, one (p. 152 below) a receipt for rent in the Ptolemaic period, the other (p. 105 above) a receipt for the Isis collection, 4 August, 63 A.D. Still nearer in date to the gospel passage is an ostrakon of very vulgar type in my collection, a receipt for alien tax paid at Thebes, 32–33 A.D., of which I here give a full-sized reproduction (Figure 11).

With the help of Ulrich Wilcken the ostrakon was thus deciphered:—

inscription from Orchomenus of the third or fourth century B.C.¹ shows the expression in use even then in the Aeolic dialect ; it is close in date to the oldest papyrus reference I know of, viz. Hibeh Papyri No. 97₅ (279–278 or 282–281 B.C.).

I think we may say, therefore, that this technical meaning of ἀπέχω, which must have been known to every Greek-speaking person, down to the meanest labourer, applies well to the stern text about the hypocrites: “they have received their reward in full,” i.e. it is as though they had already given a receipt, and they have absolutely no further claim to reward. This added touch of quiet irony makes the text more life-like and pointed. From the same technical use J. de Zwaan² has attempted to explain the enigmatical ἀπέχει in Mark xiv. 41, and it is not improbable that St. Paul is alluding to it in a gently humorous way in Phil. iv. 18.³

(3) The first scattered congregations of Greek-speaking Christians up and down the Roman Empire spoke of themselves as a “(convened) assembly”; at first each single congregation was so called, and afterwards the whole body of Christians everywhere was spoken of collectively as “the (convened) assembly.” That is the most literal translation of the Greek word ἐκκλησία.⁴ This self-bestowed name rested on the certain conviction that God had separated from the world His “saints” in Christ, and had “called” or “convened” them to an assembly, which was "God's assembly," "God's muster," because God was the convener.¹

It is one of the characteristic but little considered facts in the history of the early Christian missions that the Latin-speaking people of the West, to whom Christianity came, did not translate the Greek word ἐκκλησία (as they did many other technical terms) but simply borrowed it. Why was this? There was no lack of words for "assembly" in Latin, and as a matter of fact contio or comitia was often translated by ἐκκλησία.² There must have been some special reason for borrowing the Greek word, and it lay doubtless in the subtle feeling that Latin possessed no word exactly equivalent to the Greek ἐκκλησία. There is evidence of this feeling even in non-Christian usage. Pliny the Younger employs the Latinised word ecclesia in one of his letters to Trajan.³ Some years ago a bilingual inscription of the year 103-4 A.D.⁴ came to light at Ephesus, which furnishes a still more interesting example. It was found in the theatre, the building so familiar to readers of Acts xix., and now, thanks to the labours of the Austrian archaeologists, one of the best preserved ruins in the ancient city.⁵ A distinguished

Roman official, C. Vibius Salutaris, had presented a silver image of Diana (we are reminded at once of the silver shrines of Diana made by Demetrius, Acts xix. 24) and other statues "that they might be set up in every ἐκκλησία in the theatre upon the pedestals."¹ The parallel Latin text has, ita ut [om]n[i] e]cclesia supra bases ponerentur. The Greek word was therefore simply transcribed. Here we have a truly classical example (classical in its age and in its origin) of the instinctive feeling of Latin speakers of the West which afterwards showed itself among the Western Christians: ἐκκλησία cannot be translated, it must be taken over.

The word which thus penetrated into the West is one of the indelible marks of the origin of Christianity. Just as the words amen, abba, etc. are the Semitic birthmarks, so the word ecclesia (and many others besides) points for all time to the fact that the beginnings of Christianity must be sought also in the Greek East.

(4) For the word ἁμαρτωλός, "sinning, sinful," Cremer² quotes but one passage from Aristotle and one from Plutarch: "besides these passages only, it seems, in Biblical and ecclesiastical Greek." In the Appendix,³ however, comes this very necessary correction: "The word is found not only in the two passages quoted but also in inscriptions, and so often that it must be described as quite a usual word, at least in Syria, to designate a sinner in the religious sense." There is only one more correction to make: here, and in the epigraphical references which Cremer proceeds to give, we must read not "Syria" but "Lycia."¹

The subject had already been treated in detail by G. Hirschfeld,² and more recently L. Deubner³ published a collection of passages from inscriptions, which is almost identical with Cremer's. The inscriptions are of a class very common in the south-west of Asia Minor—epitaphs containing a threat against any one who shall desecrate the tomb, ἀμαρτωλὸς ἔστω θεοῖς (κατα)χθονίοις, "let him be as a sinner before the (sub)terranean gods." In the same district, however, we find the words ἐπάρατος, "cursed,"⁴ and ἔνοχος, "guilty," employed in exactly the same way: [ἐ]νοχος ἔστω πᾶσι θεοῖς, "let him be guilty before all the gods."⁵ This parallelism between ἀμαρτωλὸς and ἔνοχος seems to be the solution of a grammatical puzzle which has always caused me difficulties, viz. the use of the genitive after ἔνοχος⁶ especially in the important passage 1 Cor. xi. 27, to which I have long sought a parallel in inscriptions and papyri, but in vain, despite the frequent occurrence of the word. We find, however, the parallel ἀμαρτωλὸς with the genitive in inscriptions from Telmessus in Lycia, 240 B.C.,⁷ and from Myra in Lycia, before

A.D. 1,¹ and this is sufficient to account for the peculiar use of the synonymous ἐνοχος by St. Paul the Cilician² in the First Epistle to the Corinthians.

(5) The Hebrew name for the Feast of Tabernacles is ḥag hassukkōth, "feast of booths." To have been quite literal, the Greek translators of the Old Testament must have rendered this ἐορτὴ (τῶν) σκηνῶν, as is actually found in the Septuagint, Lev. xxiii. 34, Deut. xvi. 13, 2 Chron. viii. 13, Ezra iii. 4, 2 Macc. x. 6. In the majority of passages, however, in which the feast is mentioned (Deut. xvi. 16, xxxi. 10; Zech. xiv. 16, 18, 19, 1 Esdras v. 51, 1 Macc. x. 21, 2 Macc. i. 9, 18) we find the more cumbrous expression ἐορτὴ (τῆς) σκηνοπηγίας, "feast of booth-making," which has found its way into the New Testament (John vii. 2), and Josephus, and was therefore no doubt the most usual.³ The reason for the choice of this cumbrous expression is not discoverable in the Hebrew. It lies rather in the fact that the verb σκηνοπηγεῖσθαι already bore a technical religious sense in the world which spoke the language of the Septuagint. There is a long inscription⁴ from the island of Cos, probably of the 2nd century B.C., which records the arrangements for sacrifices and enumerates the acts of religion to which the worshippers were obliged. They had to offer sacrifice and they had to "erect a booth" (σκανοπαγεῖσθων),⁵ on the occasion of a great panegyry or solemn assembly, "which was probably held only once a year.”¹ It is well known that Plutarch regarded the Jewish Feast of Tabernacles as a festival of Dionysus²; the Septuagint translators, with other motives, did much the same thing: by choosing a secular name for their feast they brought it more into touch with the religious usages of the world around them. This is one more factor in the great adaptive process for which the Septuagint Bible stands in general in the history of religion.³

² Possibly it was a provincialism of S.-W. Asia Minor. For earlier treatment of the supposed "Cilicisms" in the New Testament, see Winer and Schmiedel, § 3, 2 e (p. 23).

(c) Standing phrases and fixed formulae have often found their way from the contemporary language into the New Testament.⁴

(1) The phrase δίδωμι ἐργασίαν, “I give diligence, take pains” (Luke xii. 58), explained in all the grammars as a Latinism,⁵ and not known elsewhere except in Hermogenes⁶ (2nd century A.D.), is nevertheless found in an inscription recording a decree of the Senate concerning the affairs of Stratonicia in Caria (81 B.C.).⁷ It is possible, of course, to maintain that the phrase is here imitated from the Latin original,¹ but a letter of vulgar type among the Oxyrhynchus Papyri, dated 2 B.C., has it in the imperative² just as in St. Luke, and shows it (also as St. Luke does) in living use among the people, who no longer felt that it was a "Latinism." I am informed by Wilcken that the phrase occurs again in an unpublished letter, circa 118 A.D. (Bremen Papyri No. 18).

(2) In the same context in St. Luke (xii. 57) we have the expression κρίνω τὸ δίκαιον, literally "I judge the right," which used to be regarded as unique, and which Bernhard Weiss³ explains to mean deciding about that which God demands from us. It is made clearer, however, by a prayer for vengeance addressed to Demeter which was found inscribed on a tablet of lead at Amorgus.⁴ There the goddess is implored to give right judgment. So Jesus advises those who would go to law with one another not to wait for the judge to speak but to become reconciled beforehand and thus put an end to the dispute by pronouncing "just judgment" themselves.

(3) Another gospel phrase, συναίρω λόγον, "I compare accounts, make a reckoning" (Matt. xviii. 23 f., xxv. 19), is said by Grimm and Thayer not to occur in "Greek" writers. Moulton,⁵ however, has pointed out that it occurs in two letters of the 2nd century A.D., one from Oxyrhynchus¹ and the other in the Berlin collection,² while an ostrakon from Dakkeh in Nubia, dated 6 March, 214 A.D., contains the corresponding substantival phrase.³

(4) Speaking of the devoted couple Aquila and Priscilla, in Rom. xvi. 4, St. Paul uses the words: "who for my life laid down their own necks."⁴ Many commentators have taken this phrase literally, as if Aquila and his wife had laid their heads on the block to save the apostle after he had been condemned to death by the executioner's axe. The majority, however, explain it figuratively: "to lay down one's own neck" is the same as "to risk one's own life." This interpretation is undoubtedly confirmed by a passage in one of our new texts. At the destruction of the cities of Herculaneum and Pompeii in the year 79 A.D. the citizens' libraries were of course buried along with the rest of their household furniture. Remains of these domestic libraries have been discovered in the course of excavations, and means have also been found to make the badly charred rolls in part at least legible again. One of the rolls from Herculaneum (No. 1044), for the decipherment of which we are indebted to the ingenuity and learning of Wilhelm Crönert, contains a biography of the Epicurean Philonides, who flourished about 175-150 B.C. The biographer's name is unknown; but he must have written after 150 B.C. and of course before the year in which Herculaneum was destroyed, that is to say either in, or at any rate not long before, the age of St. Paul. In this biography there occurs the following passage, mutilated at the beginning, but for our purpose sufficiently clear:¹ “[For(?)] the most beloved of his relatives or friends he would readily stake his neck.”

Here we have the same phrase as in the Epistle to the Romans, only with another verb,² and it is reasonable to suppose that in the Greek world “to lay down, or to stake one’s neck for somebody” was as current a phrase³ as, say, “to go through fire and water for somebody” is with us. Originating, no doubt, in the phraseology of the law,⁴ the phrase was probably in the time of the Epistle to the Romans no longer understood literally. The merit of the apostle’s devoted friends is in no way diminished by this observation: it must certainly have been an unusually great sacrifice of the personal kind that Aquila and Priscilla had dared for St. Paul. We may adopt the words of the pagan roll that was buried under the lava of Vesuvius some twenty years after the Epistle to the Romans was written, and say it was something that one would dare only “for the most beloved of one’s relatives or friends.”

(5) St. Paul’s fondness for legal expressions has been often observed in other cases,⁵ and will meet with further confirmation in these pages.¹ In Phil. iv. 3 we have another curious echo of the language of the documents: "whose names (are) in the book of life"² sounds like the formula "whose names are shown in the little book,"³ which occurs in a document of the year 190 A.D.⁴ The coincidence might be accidental, and I would not quote it here were it not that the phrase ὧν τὰ ὀνόματα, "whose names," is certainly demonstrable as a characteristic documentary formula, often occurring in the Berlin papyri, e.g. No. 181₁₆ (57 A.D.) and No. 72_{6f.} (191 A.D.). In No. 344₁ (second or third century A.D.) it is even found, as in Mark xiv. 32 for instance, without a verb, and it is certainly not a Hebraism there.⁵

D. The Syntax of the New Testament has hitherto been least of all regarded in the light of the new texts. For instance, one of the greatest weaknesses of Blass's Grammar is that in the syntactical portions the New Testament is far too much isolated, and phenomena that might be easily⁶ illustrated from the pagan inscriptions, papyri, and ostraca, are frequently explained as Hebraisms. One typical example is the phrase just mentioned, "whose names," used without any verb. And yet, at the present day, there is so much new solid knowledge to be gained!

(1) To take one example: in the period of the new religious movement the colloquial language of the Mediterranean area exhibits specially interesting changes and additions with regard to prepositional usages.¹ How are we to understand the passages, so important from the point of view of religious history, in which St. Paul and others employ the prepositions ὑπέρ and ἀντί, unless we pay attention to the contemporary "profane" uses?

The phrase βλέπειν ἀπό, "to beware of," is explained by Blass² as Hebrew, by Wellhausen³ as Semitic; and yet it is used in a papyrus letter of strongly vulgar type, 4 August, 41 A.D., by a writer who was surely not a Jew, for he gives this warning: "and thou, do thou beware thee of the Jews."⁴

The combination of εἶναι and similar verbs with εἰς, which is after a Hebrew model according to Blass⁵ and like Lamed according to Wellhausen,⁶ occurs in inscriptions and papyri.⁷ I have found anespecially valuable¹ example among the inscriptions of Priene, of about the second century B.C.²

What light has been shed on the formula εἰς τὸ ὄνομα, "in the name," by the inscriptions, papyri, and not least by the ostraca! To the previous examples³ of this, a legal formula⁴ current in the Hellenistic world, I can now add from my own collection an ostracon from Thebes, of the second century A.D., which is important also in other respects (Figure 12).

As deciphered by Wilcken the reading is:—

As the ostrakon contains the name "Maria" it constitutes a new document in the history of the Jewish¹ Diaspora in Egypt, and more particularly in Thebes.² To claim it on that account as a proof of the genuine "Judæo-Greek" character of our formula would be trivial, in view of the numerous and early pagan examples that are already known.

(2) According to Mark vi. 7 Jesus sent forth His disciples δύο δύο, "by two and two." A distributive numeral relation is here expressed in the Greek by repeating the cardinal number. Wellhausen³ says this is not truly Greek, but⁴ it is found in Aeschylus⁵ and Sophocles.⁶ These examples would be sufficient to account for the same use in the Septuagint and in the New Testament ; it agrees with the Semitic use,¹ it is true, but it is good popular Greek for all that. It has been shown by Karl Dieterich² to exist in Middle Greek, and has remained in Modern Greek down to the present day.³ We can trace this use, therefore, through a period of two thousand five hundred years. A welcome new link in the long chain of witnesses from Aeschylus to the Bible and from the Bible till to-day was added by a letter of the 3rd century A.D., among the Oxyrhynchus Papyri (No. 121), in which a certain Isidorus writes to one Aurelius to "bind the branches by three and three in bundles."⁴ Still more recently there has come in the Oxyrhynchus Papyri (No. 886_{19f.}) a magical formula of the 3rd cent. A.D., which exhibits a curious mixture of this and a prepositional construction.⁵

(3) In conclusion we may select from the abundance of new syntactical observations an example which has lately met with general recognition, viz. the peculiar "nominative" πλήρης in the prologue to by Thumb, Die griechische Sprache, p. 128. Blass, Grammatik des Neutestamentlichen Griechisch,² p. 146 [Engl. ed.² pp. 145, 330], rightly inferred from this that the Atticists opposed this form of expression, which they therefore must have found present in the vernacular, "and it was not merely Jewish Greek."

⁵ ἔρε [= αἶρε] κατὰ δύο δύο, "take them up by two and two."—In the Oxyrhynchus Papyri No. 940₆ (letter, 5th cent. A.D.) μλαν μλαν is used, so the editors (Grenfell and Hunt) think, in the sense of una = "together" (Part VI. 1908, p. 310).

St. John (i. 14),¹ which bears intimately on a celebrated problem of this gospel. If I am not mistaken,² this “nominative” has been regarded by a pious Silesian commentator of our own day as a peculiarly fine dogmatic distinction of the inspired sacred text. In matters linguistic, however, the commentator’s piety is not enough. I agree, mutatis mutandis, with Hans Thoma,³ who once told the Protestant clergy of Baden that it would be more desirable to have a sinner painting good pictures than to have a saint painting bad ones.⁴ The present case, therefore, must be decided by cold philological considerations, and philology tells us, on the evidence of papyri,⁵ ostraca, and wooden tablets, that πλήρης as used by the people had often shrunk and become indeclinable. The oldest example hitherto known⁶ is in the dreams of the twin-sisters and Ptolemaeus,⁷ 160 B.C., contemporary, therefore, with the Septuagint usage. Another pre-Johannine example is afforded by an Egyptian wooden tablet, probably of the reign of Augustus.⁸ Next come a number of quotations from papyri, and, as might have been expected, the statistics have been further enriched by the ostraca.¹ Moulton² is quite right in saying that a Greek with a literary training would not have used the shrunken form. But he goes too far in assuming that it was first introduced into the Gospel of St. John by a copyist. The copyists worked as a rule quite mechanically, like our compositors; when they made linguistic changes in the text of the New Testament they did so under the orders of trained theologians—men who generally must have been under the influence of Atticism and opposed to the vernacular. Where the textual authorities show variations, then in the gospels and in St. Paul popular forms have always a fair claim to preference. There is no special reason for regarding πλήρης in St. John as not original. The vulgar form occurring in the lapidary style of the prologue—a field anemone amid the marble blocks—is in fact a clear token of the popular character which even this gospel bears. The scholar whose instinct may have been misled by the word Logos in the first line is brought back to the right road by this undoubted popular form.

E. We pass now to consider briefly, in conclusion, the style of the New Testament in the light of the profane texts.³ The transition is an easy one, for we can still take our examples from the Johannine writings. It has become an inviolable tradition with commentators to represent the Johannine style as particularly Semitic, chiefly on account of its preference for paratactic constructions, especially "and . . . and," which occurs so frequently. The very latest critic of the Johannine style, E. von Dobschütz,¹ who distinguishes an original and an adaptation in the First Epistle of St. John, has these observations on the style of the original, conveyed, it may be remarked, in a highly paratactic style of his own :—

"Thesis stands beside thesis, sentence opposes sentence; there are none of the delicate connecting particles, appropriate to every gradation in the thought, which are so abundant in classical Greek. These are no doubt greatly diminished in the colloquial language of the Hellenistic period. But a style such as we have here is really not Greek. It is Semitic thinking that is here displayed. Only in the Septuagint is there anything like it to be found."

Apart from our new texts altogether, we could appeal to the facts of Indo-Germanic philology in refutation of this branding of parataxis as "not Greek." Parataxis appears to be not Greek only from the orthodox point of view of the Atticists, who laid it down that the periodic structure with hypotaxis was good, beautiful, and Greek par excellence. As a matter of fact, parataxis was the original form of Greek speech; it survived continuously in the language of the people, and even found its way into literature when the ordinary conversation of the people was imitated. The facts are admirably stated by Karl Brugmann² :—

“It is beyond doubt that the language of Homer exhibits on the whole far more of the original paratactic structure than the language of Herodotus and the Attic prose writers, such as Thucydides, Plato, Demosthenes. . . . This is not because the language of Homer is older and closer to the primitive Indo-Germanic type of language, but rather because the epic is less detached than the later literature from the natural soil of language. Wherever in the Indo-Germanic sphere a genuine popular dialect is found to exist side by side with a more highly developed literary language, we see that the popular dialect makes far more use of the paratactic form of expression than the literary language. If a work of later date, say, for example, of the 3rd century B.C., were preserved, presenting to us as true a specimen of popular sentence-construction as the Homeric poems, the language of Homer would probably in this respect appear scarcely more archaic. There is in fact no very great difference to be detected between Homeric Greek and the Modern Greek dialects in this particular. When, in the age of literary practice and scholastic training, we find authors using paratactic constructions where they might have employed hypotactic forms, such being in general use in the cultivated language, we may generally assume that there has been an upward borrowing from the forms of the language of every-day life.”

Brugmann illustrates this last remark by examples from the Greek Comedy and from Demosthenes; in both cases there is conscious imitation of the popular¹ style.²

If we have once recognised the popular character of the Johannine style—not an imitation, this, but in large measure a wild, natural growth—then we have solved the riddle which our Atticist commentators with their censorial attitude are always discovering. St. John is popular in style when he is narrating something, or when he is making reflections of his own, no less than when he reproduces the sayings of Christ. It is easy to find examples of both—the popular narrative style, with its short paratactic sentences and its “and . . . and,” and the stately style, impressive by the very simplicity of its popular appeal, in which the Divinity speaks in the first person to strangers and devotees.

² The examples in Wilhelm Schmid, Der Atticismus, I. p. 422, II. p. 299, III. p. 326, are also very well worth considering. Cf. also Eduard Schwyzer, Neugriechische Syntax und altgriechische, Neue Jahrbücher für das klassische Altertum, etc., 1908, 1 Abteilung, 21 Band, p. 500; and Jean Psichari, Essai sur le Grec de la Septante, p. 186.

One of the finest examples of popular narrative style is the report by an Egyptian named Ptolemaeus, in the year 160 B.C., of a dream that he had had (Paris Papyri, No. 51). I should have liked to reprint this extraordinarily interesting text here,¹ but it is advisable to await the appearance of Wilcken's edition of the papyri of the Ptolemaic period, which will doubtless give us the dream of Ptolemaeus with considerably improved readings.

Another good example is the letter of consolation written by Irene, an Egyptian woman of the second century A.D., and found at Oxyrhynchus. This letter will be discussed in a later chapter.²

Here is the story told by two “pig-merchants,” about 171 A.D., in their letter of complaint to the Strategus, found at Euhemeria (Kasr el-Banât) in the Fayûm³:—

How firmly this "and . . . and" style was rooted in the language of the people is shown by a much later bill of complaint of a Christian Egyptian woman who had been ill-treated by her husband (Oxyrhynchus Papyri, No. 903, 4th century A.D.).

The parallelism of the style comes out most clearly if we compare texts of similar content. For instance we might take these sentences from the story of the man born blind (John ix. 7, 11) :—

7. Καὶ εἶπεν αὐτῷ· ὕπαγε νίψαι εἰς τὴν κολυμβήθραν τοῦ Σιλωάμ (ὃ ἐρμηνεύεται ἀπεσταλμένος). ἀπῆλθεν οὖν

¹ Cf. the parallel descriptive details of the robber scene in the parable of the Good Samaritan, Luke x. 30: mention of the road on which the outrage took place ("from Jerusalem to Jericho"), the stripes ("beat him," R.V.), the theft of clothing. It is clear that Jesus was successful in hitting the popular tone. The papyri and inscriptions furnish good contemporary illustrations of the same kind to other of our Lord's parables, e.g. the importunate widow (Luke xviii. 1 ff.) Tauetis of the village of Socnopaei Nesos (Berliner Griechische Urkunden, No. 522, Fayûm, 2nd century A.D.), or the prodigal son Antonis Longus with his confession of sins to his mother Nilus (Berliner Griechische Urkunden, No. 846, Fayûm, 2nd century A.D.; see below, pp. 176 ff.).

and said unto me, Go to Siloam, and wash: so I went away and washed, and I received sight. (R.V.)

Compare with these sentences one of four records of cures inscribed on a marble tablet some time after 138 A.D., probably at the temple of Asclepius on the island in the Tiber at Rome¹:—

Οὐαλερίῳ Ἄπρῳ στρατιώτῃ τυφλῷ ἐχρημάτισεν² ὁ θεὸς ἐλθεῖν³ καὶ λαβεῖν αἷμα ἐξ ἀλεκτρύωνος λευκοῦ μετὰ μέ-τριῖναι καὶ ἐπὶ τρεῖς ἡμέρας ἐπιχρεῖσαι⁵ ἐπὶ τοὺς ὀφθαλμοὺς. καὶ ἀνέβλεψεν⁶ καὶ soldier, the god revealed² that he should go³ and take blood of a white cock, together with honey, and rub them into an eyesalve⁴ and anoint⁵ his eyes three days. And he received his sight,⁶ and came⁷ and gave thanks⁸ publicly⁹ to the god.¹⁰

This text is, if possible, even more paratactic ("Semitic," people would say, if it were a quotation from the New Testament) than the corresponding passage in St. John.

¹ Corpus Inscriptionum Graecarum, No. 5980_{15ff.} = Dittenberger, Sylloge,² No. 807_{15ff.} Apart from the mere words the parallelism is of course remarkable. Similarities both formal and actual occur also in the three other records and in numerous tablets of the same kind from Epidaurus. For a perfectly simple narrative style, consisting almost entirely of participial constructions and sentences connected by καὶ, cf. the long inscription recording the "Acts of Heracles," Corpus Inscriptionum Graecarum, No. 5984. The word πράξεις is here used as in the title of St. Luke's and other "Acts of the Apostles."

² So used frequently in the Greek Bible in the sense of divine warning or revelation [e.g., LXX Jer. xxxii. (xxv.) 30, xxxvii. (xxx.) 2, xliii. (xxxvi.) 2, 4; Matt. ii. 12, 22; Luke ii. 26; Acts x. 22; Heb. viii. 5, xi. 7, xii. 25].

³ Corresponding to the direct imperative "Go" in St. John.

⁴ Cf. the clay made of earth and spittle in St. John.

⁶ As in St. John.

⁷ As in John ix. 7.

⁸ As often in the New Testament.

¹⁰ Cf. the grateful Samaritan, Luke xvii. 15 f.

Most striking of all, however, is the similarity between St. John's solemn use of the first personal pronoun and certain non-Christian and pre-Christian examples of the same style employed in the service of religion. Diodorus of Sicily has preserved an inscription in this style in honour of Isis at Nysa in "Arabia," and there has recently been discovered another Isis inscription in the island of Ios, while echoes of the same style are found in texts of post-Johannine date. In the case of the second inscription there is another¹ of those delightful accidents to be recorded which serve to recompense all who are wearied by the toil of compiling the statistics of language. This inscription, highly important also in respect of its contents, is now in the church of St. John the Divine, Ios, written on a portion of fluted column which now serves to support the altar: St. John the Divine has rescued this venerable document of a prose akin to his own. The first editor of the inscription, R. Weil,² considered it, strangely enough, to be an imperial edict or letter of the period of the Christian persecutions. Its true character was afterwards pointed out to him by Evstratiadis.³ It has repeatedly engaged the attention of scholars, and was last published by Baron F. Hiller von Gaertingen,⁴ who assigns the writing to the second or third century A.D. By his kind agency I am enabled to reproduce here (Figure 13), with the permission of the Epigraphical Commission of the Prussian Academy of Sciences, a carefully prepared facsimile of this uncommonly interesting text by Alfred Schiff. In spite of the late writing the text itself, as shown by the parallel text from Nysa in our pre-Christian authority Diodorus, is old in the main, and probably much older than the Gospel of St. John.

In order not to break the historical continuity I give first of all the text from Nysa, then that from Ios,¹ thirdly a Johannine text of similar form, and lastly an example of the sacral use of the first person singular that is no doubt later than St. John.

I

Diodorus of Sicily († 27 B.C.) says in his *History*² that he was acquainted with writers who had described the tombs of Isis and Osiris at Nysa in ¹ Among pre-Johannine texts we might also mention the "Praise of Wisdom," in Ecclesiasticus xxiv., where the first personal pronoun is used at least four times in the solemn manner. This style can undoubtedly be traced still further back: cf. the solemn "I am" of Jahveh in the Old Testament, and the "I" used by the kings in ancient Oriental inscriptions, an echo of which is found in the late inscription of Silco, a 6th cent. Christian King of Nubia (Dittenberger, Orientalis Graeci Inscriptiones Selectae, No. 201). The parataxis in this inscription, which is sufficiently barbaric in other respects, is exactly paralleled in the Isis inscriptions of Nysa and Ios. The best parallels to the use of the first personal pronoun are to be found in Egyptian sacred texts. Cf. for instance the texts in Albrecht Dieterich's Eine Mithrasliturgie erläutert, Leipzig, 1903, p. 194 f., and the same scholar's references to the Leyden magical papyrus V. in the Jahrbücher für classische Philologie herausg. von Alfred Fleckeisen, 16, Supplementband, Leipzig, 1888, p. 773. E.g., in the same papyrus, VII₂₃, we have ἐγὼ εἰμὶ Ὅσιρις ὁ καλούμενος ὕδωρ, ἐγὼ εἰμὶ Ἰσις ἡ καλουμένη δρόσος, "I am Osiris, who am called 'Water'; I am Isis, who am called 'Dew.'" Formal and actual parallels are also found in the London magical papyrus No. 46_{236f.} and 121_{48f.} (Kenyon, I. pp. 72, 100), and particularly in Apuleius, Metamorphoses, 11. 5.

² I. 27. I quote from the edition by F. Vogel, Leipzig, 1888.

Diodorus also gives a fragment of the Osiris inscription. Like the other it consists of brief statements by Osiris about himself, but the word “I” is not so conspicuous as in the Isis text.

II

That the Nysa inscription was no fiction but a permanent constituent in liturgical texts of the Isis cult, is proved by the later record from Ios (Fig. 13), which is longer, but in no other respect discordant. I print it here without preserving the original division into lines, only marking (for convenience in referring to the facsimile) the point where every fifth line begins.

¹ This statement must be regarded with suspicion. The text came probably, as Wilcken conjectures, from Bubastis. Nysa is a fabulous place.

there is a good reason for this: in anticipation of the problem which will engage our attention in Chapter IV. I was anxious to show how close the resemblance can be between the Hellenised Old Testament and Hellenised Egyptian religion. The actual relationship of ideas being so close, how easy must it have been for Hellenistic Judaism and Christianity to adopt the remarkable and simple style of expression in the first person singular.¹

In spite of distortion caused by the would-be wizardry the features of the old style are recognisable in the following passage from the London magical papyrus No. 46,^{145 ff.}¹ which was written in the 4th century A.D. Similar examples would not be difficult to find in other magical texts.²

it with metrical paraphrases. This we can do in the case both of the Isis inscription and of the Johannine texts. There is an inscription of the age of Augustus in the island of Andros,¹ consisting of a hymn to Isis in hexameters, and based evidently on the old formulae known to us from the inscriptions of Nysa and Ios. For comparison with the Gospel of St. John we have the pompous hexameters of Nonnus. Contrasted with their originals these verses sound something like the rhyming paraphrase of the Psalms by Dr. Ambrosius Lobwasser (anglice Praisewater), Professor of Law and Assessor to the Royal Court of Justice at Königsberg, achieved in 1573.

“Zu Gott wir unser Zuflucht haben, Wann uns schon Unglück thut antraben”— so the good man begins the Psalm² out of which Luther had quarried the granite for his “Feste Burg.” The “watered praises” of Lobwasser’s Psalter are about equal in merit, perhaps even superior, to the hexameters into which Nonnus and the author of the Andros hymn diluted the old lines couched in homely, vigorous “I”-style.

4. From whatever side the New Testament may be regarded by the Greek scholar, the verdict of historical philology, based on the contemporary texts of the world surrounding the New Testament, will never waver. For the most part, the pages of our sacred Book are so many records of popular Greek, in its various grades; taken as a whole the New Testament is a Book of the people. Therefore we say that Luther, in taking the New Testament from the doctors and presenting it to the people, was only giving back to the people their own. We enter, perhaps, an attic-room in one of our large cities, and if we find there some poor old body reading her Testament beside the few fuchsias and geraniums on the window-sill, then we feel that the old Book is in a position to which its very nature entitles it. Think too of the Japanese New Testament found by a Red Cross sister in a wounded man's knapsack during the war between Russia and Japan: that was also a grateful resting-place for the old Book. We will go further, and say: this great Book of the people ought really never to be published in sumptuous editions with costly engravings and expensive binding. The Egyptian potsherds with Gospel fragments,¹ the Paternoster from Megara,² the *Biblia Pauperum*³ and the Stuttgart Groschenbibel,⁴ are in their externals more in keeping with the character of the New Testament than the proposed Double-crown Bible⁵ and the other éditions de luxe bought by rich German godfathers for Confirmation presents. The plainer the cover, the more modest the type, the coarser the paper, the nearer the pictures come to the style of Dürer or Rembrandt, the more fitly will the great Book of the people be arrayed.

² [Psalm xlv. Lobwasser might be thus imitated: “To God for refuge each one flieth When to o’erride us trouble trieth.” Luther’s celebrated “Ein’ feste Burg ist unser Gott” is best represented in Carlyle’s version, “A safe stronghold our God is still, A trusty shield and weapon,” etc. TR.]

The Book of the people has become, in the course of centuries, the Book of all mankind. At the present day no book in the world is printed so often and in so many languages as the New Testament. From the people to mankind at large: historical philology establishes the causal connexion underlying this development. The New Testament was not a product of the colourless refinement of an upper class that had nothing left to hope for, whose classical period lay, irretrievable, in the past. On the contrary, it was, humanly speaking, a product of the force that came unimpaired, and strengthened by the Divine Presence, from the lower class (Matt. xi. 25 f. ; 1 Cor. i. 26–31). This reason alone enabled it to become the Book of all mankind.

And so the simple texts on stone, papyrus, and earthenware have helped us, firstly, to a knowledge of the sacred Volume on its linguistic side, and then, by that means, to no small understanding of its most distinguishing characteristic. A new ray of light falls on its history among the nations. The New Testament has become the Book of the Peoples because it began by being the Book of the People.

CHAPTER III

THE NEW TESTAMENT AS LITERATURE, ILLUSTRATED BY THE NEW TEXTS

1. OUR estimate of the New Testament will be much the same as we have just stated if we now approach it from the point of view of literary history. Here again it is the records of the world contemporary with the New Testament that have supplied us with the right standard of criticism.

In saying this we may seem at first to be preparing difficulties for ourselves. We have insisted more than once that the records referred to are to a great extent non-literary, yet now we claim that they throw light on literary questions. This seems to be self-contradictory; and I can well imagine that some readers will be astonished to hear me say that these poor scraps of papyrus, or potsherds inscribed with fragments of letters from unknown Egyptians, have taught me to understand the true nature of St. Paul's Epistles and, ultimately, the course by which Primitive Christianity developed on the literary side. But I ask the incredulous to give me a patient hearing.¹

¹ For what follows cf. the "Prolegomena to the Biblical Letters and Epistles" in Bibelstudien, 1895, pp. 187-252 [Bible Studies, pp. 1-59], and the article "Epistolary Literature" in the Encyclopaedia Biblica, II., London, 1901, col. 1323 ff.; also the outline in Beiträge zur Weiterentwicklung der christlichen Religion, München, 1905, p. 119 ff. These sources have been

The mention of the literary side of Primitive Christianity brings us to a branch of inquiry the importance of which has until now been all too little recognised. Whole libraries, it is true, have been written concerning the growth of the New Testament and the origin of its several parts, but the fact remains that it has seldom been viewed, as the literary historian would view it, in relation to the history of ancient literature. None but a very few scholars have felt the need of studying Primitive Christianity with the strictness of the literary historian. One honourable exception to be named here was Franz Overbeck, whose important study "On the Beginnings of Patristic Literature"¹ was published in 1882. As a general rule it is not so much as indicated that there is a problem to be solved, for the New Testament is approached with the preconceived idea that the Primitive Christian texts which owe their preservation to their inclusion in that book were themselves without exception "books" and works of literature.

But this preconceived idea must be given up. If we were to regard the New Testament merely as an assemblage of little works of literature and treat made occasional use of here.—K. Dziatzko, article "Brief" in Pauly's Real-Encyclopädie der classischen Altertumswissenschaft, new edition by G. Wissowa, III., Stuttgart, 1899, col. 836 ff., takes the same view as regards the main questions.

it accordingly in our studies, we should commit the same mistake as an art-critic who proposed to treat a collection of fossils and ancient sculpture as if it contained nothing but works of art. We must not assume that the New Testament is literature from cover to cover. Whether it began as literature in its single parts is a question to be inquired about. The inquiry resolves itself into these questions: Did Primitive Christianity begin by being literary? When did it become so? What were the stages it went through in the process?

2. These questions, I think, have more than a purely academic interest: they contribute to a thorough appreciation of what Primitive Christianity really was. But in order to answer them we must come to an understanding about the meaning of our term "literature" and about the various forms in which literature may find expression.

The service here rendered us by the inscriptions, papyri, and ostraca is incalculable. Being themselves non-literary texts they remind us that a thing is not necessarily literature because it has been committed to writing and preserved in written form. Being also popular texts they accustom us, when we come to literature, to distinguish the popular from the artistic.

What then is literature? Literature is something written for the public (or at least for a public) and cast in a definite artistic form.

A man, however, who draws up a lease or an application to some public official, or who writes a receipt or a letter, is not engaged in literature. Lease, application, receipt, letter, and a host of similar documents, are non-literary. They are the products not of art but of life ; their destiny is not for the public and posterity but for the passing moment in a workaday world. This it is that makes the thousands of non-literary texts, on stone, papyrus, or pottery, such delightful reading. In large measure they are records of life, not works of art : records testifying of work, joy, and sorrow, and never intended for us, though a bountiful fate, willing that we after-comers should enter into pure human contact with the past, has made them ours.

There is one special class of these records of human life and work which the new discoveries have brought to light again in astonishing plenty and most delightful freshness. These are ancient non-literary letters, exchanged by private persons on terms of intimacy, and preserved not in late copies but in their originals, on lead, papyrus, or earthenware fragment. What would have been impossible in the seventies and eighties of the last century is possible now, and a history of ancient letter-writing might really be written. Conceived most comprehensively, it would cover a period of several thousand years ; restricted to ancient letter-writing in Greek and Latin it would yet run to more than one thousand.

To think of "literature" or to speak of "epistolary literature" in connexion with these hundreds of ancient original letters would be utterly perverse¹ (or only possible if we were to employ the word "literature" in a secondary and colourless sense with regard to non-literary writing). The epistolary literature of antiquity is something altogether different. That is represented by the literary letter, the artistic letter, the epistle,¹ of which we shall have to speak later on. On the contrary, we must banish all thought of literature, of conscious artistic prose, when we turn the pages of the letters that have come down to us. They are texts from which we can learn what is non-literary and pre-literary. And that is precisely what we must learn if we are to understand the New Testament historically.

3. Let us then from this abundance select a few specimens characteristic of the thousand years between Alexander the Great and Mohammed, beginning with the oldest Greek letter in existence and coming down to the letters of Egyptian Christians in the time before Islam.

The little collection² will make admirably clear to us the essential nature of the letter and the forms it assumed in antiquity. The illustrations will give some idea of the inimitable individuality of each single original. We should give a false picture if we selected only the choicest specimens, so we have been careful to include some unimportant examples of average letters.

The collection has moreover a secondary purpose,

¹ I employ this word technically to distinguish the artistic letter from the real letter.

² Cf. also the collection of letters in Bibelstudien, p. 208 ff. (a different selection in Bible Studies, p. 21 ff.); Paul Viereck, Aus der hinterlassenen Privatkorrespondenz der alten Ägypter, Vossische Zeitung, 3 January, 1895, first supplement; Erman and Krebs, Aus den Papyrus der Königlichen Museen, p. 209 ff. as will appear in the fourth chapter. It is to bring home to us certain types of the ancient soul.

Letter from Mnesiergus, an Athenian, to his housemates, 4th century B.C., leaden tablet from Chaïdari, near Athens, now in the Berlin Museum, discovered by R. Wünsch, deciphered by him and A. Wilhelm (Figures 14 and 15).

This letter is the oldest Greek letter hitherto known, and of the greatest importance especially for the history of epistolary forms. We are indebted for this valuable specimen to the careful labours of Richard Wünsch¹; it was definitively deciphered and explained in masterly fashion by Adolf Wilhelm.² By permission of the Imperial Austrian Archaeological Institute I am enabled to reproduce here a facsimile of the same size as the original. The tablet was originally folded together and perhaps fastened with string and seal. On the outside of the tablet is the address (Figure 14), which was written after the lead had been folded :—

ον τὸν χυτρικόν.
ἀποδόναι³ δὲ Ναυσίαι ἢ Θρασυκλήν ἢ θ' υἱῶν.

ware pottery market;⁴ to Thrasycles or to his son.

On the inside, and with the lines running in the opposite direction, is the salutation⁵ and the text

⁵ In the commentaries on the letters of St. Paul the salutation which serves as introduction to the body of the letter is generally spoken of as the address. That is not correct: the address, as shown by this letter, the oldest that has come down to us, was written on the outside or on the cover of the folded of the letter proper (Figure 15). It seems that Mnesiergus was in the country and had probably been surprised by a sudden frost:—

Mnesiergus sendeth to them that are at his house greeting and health and he saith it is so with him. If² ye be willing, send me some covering, either sheepskins or goat-skins,⁴ as plain as ye have, and not brodered with fur, and shoe-soles: upon occasion I will return them.

The contents of this letter, the earliest that we possess, are not particularly striking, it is true; but whoever thinks them trivial must also regard as trivial St. Paul's request for the cloak that he left at Troas with Carpus (2 Tim. iv. 13).

letter, and in St. Paul's case was no doubt much shorter than the salutation. Not one of St. Paul's letters preserves it.—On the ancient form of salutation used in this letter (and on the salutations generally) cf. Gustav Adolf Gerhard, Untersuchungen zur Geschichte des griechischen Briefes. Erstes Heft, Die Anfangsformel, Diss. Heidelberg, Tübingen, 1903, p. 32.

² The sentence with εἰ is probably not, as Wilhelm supposes, the protasis to the concluding words, τυχὸν ἀποδώσω, but a request made into an independent sentence by aposiopesis, as vivid and colloquial as the well authenticated request in Luke xxii. 42, Πάτερ, εἰ βούλει παρενέγκαι τοῦτο τὸ ποτήριον ἀπ' ἐμοῦ, "Father, if Thou wouldst remove this cup from Me!" [Professor Deissmann, it will be observed, deletes the comma before remove. It seems possible, however, without assuming an aposiopesis, to take παρενέγκαι or ἀποπέμψαι as an infinitive absolute = imperative (cf. φέρειν, ἀποδόναι in the address of this letter), and to regard it as the apodosis. I have therefore ventured to harmonise the translation of the letter with the A.V. and R.V. of Luke xxii. 42. TR.]

The letter gives us a glimpse of the domestic life of an obviously well-to-do family. A festival is coming on: mother and daughter insist that at the sacrifice (and sacrificial dance?) flutes and the rattle of castanets shall not be wanting, and of course the musicians must be nicely dressed. Then come anxieties about the festive meal, from the roast to the dessert, not forgetting the new crockery that must be bought for kitchen and table, and added to this the annoyance of the runaway slave—really, as master of the house, there is much for Demophon to think of; and it is no light matter, the transport of man and beast, pottery, cheese, and vegetables. But there, friend Ptolemaeus, who is over the guards, will lend a few of his men who can help the boatmen, and money shall be no obstacle. Altogether the details of the proposed festival remind us of the slight but very lifelike touches with which Jesus pictures the feast at the return of the Prodigal Son.¹

² This is no doubt a euphemism, but it helps to explain a habit of St. Paul, the artisan missionary. St. Paul generally dictated his letters, no doubt because writing was not an easy thing to his workman's hand. Then in his large handwriting (Gal. vi. 11), over which he himself makes merry (Bibelstudien, p. 264; Bible Studies, p. 348; Moulton and Milligan, The Expositor, Oct. 1908, p. 383), he himself adds the conclusion, which perhaps begins at verse 2 of chapter V. According to ancient procedure the autograph conclusion was proof of authenticity, cf. C. G. Bruns, Die Unterschriften in den römischen Rechtsurkunden, Philologische und Historische Abhandlungen der Königl. Akademie der Wissenschaften zu Berlin aus dem Jahre 1876, pp. 41-138, especially pp. 69 f., 81, 83, 90, 121, 137. Wilcken called my attention to this important essay. Dziatko, in the article quoted at p. 144 above, refers to the statement of C. Julius Victor (Rhet. lat. min. p. 448 Halm): observabant veteres carissimis sua manu scribere vel plurimum subscribere, "to very intimate correspondents the ancients used to write or, very often, sign the letter with their own hand." The hundreds of autograph signatures to papyrus letters are greatly in need of investigation at the present time. A study of them would lead to a better appreciation of that extremely important passage in 2 Thess. iii. 17, which some most strangely regard as a mark of spuriousness: "the salutation of Paul with mine own hand, which is the token in every letter: so I write." The token (the last line or two in autograph) has the same significance as the symbolum, which in other cases was sometimes given to the bearer to take with him as proof of his commission; cf. the pre-Christian letter of Timoxenus to Moschion, preserved in the Passalacqua Papyrus (Bibelstudien, p. 212 f. [not given in Bible Studies]; Witkowski, Epistulae privatae, No. 25), and Letronne, Notices et Extraits, 18, 2, p. 407 f. In one of the letters of Plato (No. 13, Epistolographi Graeci rec. Rudolphus Hercher, Parisiis, 1873, p. 528) ἔμβολον actually has the same meaning as σημεῖον in St. Paul: a sign of authenticity contained in the letter itself.—From his own statement, just quoted, it follows of course that St. Paul appended an autograph conclusion to all his letters, even where he does not expressly say so. The recipients observed it at once by the difference in the handwriting. Cf. the remarks on letter No. 5 below, p. 158 f. In the Second Epistle to the Corinthians the autograph conclusion begins at x. 1.

No. 744.—A photograph was very kindly obtained for me by Dr. Grenfell, and from this was made the slightly reduced facsimile (Fig. 18) which is here reproduced by permission of the Egypt Exploration Fund.—The letter has also been published by Lietzmann, Griechische Papyri, p. 8 f., and Witkowski, Epistulae privatae, p. 97 f.

² Witkowski prints it wherever Grenfell and Hunt have inserted the iota subscript, which Hilarion did not use. I give the text without alteration, so as not to detract from its vulgar character.

³ The α is a slip of the writer.

⁶ Probably the return of Hilarion's fellow-workmen from Alexandria to Oxyrhynchus is referred to.

⁷ ἐρωτάω, "I pray (thee)," generally explained as a Semiticism in the Greek Bible, is common in popular texts: Bibelstudien, p. 45; Neue Bibelstudien, p. 23; Bible Studies, pp. 290, 195.

Ἱλαρίων Ἀλιτι ἀπόδος. | Hilarion to Alis. Deliver.

The situation in this letter is clear as to the chief facts. Hilarion is working for wages in the metropolis, Alexandria, and intends to remain there although his fellow-workmen are already about to return home. Anxiety is felt for him at home at Oxyrhynchus by his wife Alis, who is living with (her mother?) Berus and (her only child?) Apollonarin. She is expecting her confinement; gloomy thoughts arise within her:

² Hilarion has written the accusative instead of the dative. He means, “I will send (them) up to thee.”

Hilarion has forgotten me, he sends neither letter nor money, and where is bread to come from for the growing family? She confides her trouble to her friend Aphrodisias, who is going to Alexandria, and through her Hilarion hears of his wife's sad case. He sends the letter (by his comrades who are returning home, or by Aphrodisias): words merely, no money (the wages are said to be not yet paid), and in spite of a tender line for the child, in spite of the sentimental "Howe'er can I forget thee?"¹ nothing but brutal advice in the main: if it is a girl that you are bringing into the world, expose it. Has custom blunted the fatherly instinct in him? Has poverty made him unfeeling towards his own flesh and blood? Is he, as his name implies, a gay dog, a good-for-nothing, to whom it is all one so long as he can have his pleasure in the great city? Or are we doing him an injustice, because we do not understand that mysterious pollapollon? But there is no explaining away the fact that a child is expected and is perhaps to be exposed. I have met with a striking parallel in Apuleius²: a man setting out on a journey orders his wife, who is in expectation of becoming a mother, to kill the child immediately if it should prove to be a girl.

In any case, therefore, the letter displays a sad picture of civilisation in the age which saw the birth of the great Friend of Children, a scene in which the fortunes of a proletarian family are reflected in their naked horror, a background of distinct contrast to what Jesus said of the value of children. In the time of poor Alis mothers innumerable, who found it difficult to be motherly owing to the scarcity of daily bread, were waiting for that which to us—such is the extent of the moral conquests made by the Gospel—seems to be a thing of course. A century and a half later the Epistle to Diognetus (v. 6) boasts that the Christians do not expose their children.

For the photographs from which, with the permission of the Imperial Postal Museum, the facsimiles (Figs. 19, 20) were made, I am indebted to the kind offices of W. Schubart. The illustrations reduce the size of the originals by about one quarter.

² ἴδιος, "his own," is used quite in the colourless Biblical sense (without any emphasis on "own"). Cf. Bibelstudien, p. 120 f.; Bible Studies, p. 123.

I give this little text, belonging to the time of the Pauline mission, as an example of the letters of commendation which St. Paul mentions more than once (2 Cor. iii. 1 ; 1 Cor. xvi. 3) and himself employed (Rom. xvi.). In the wider sense, at least, it is a letter of recommendation. The Latin letter printed below (No. 12) is an example in the narrowest sense of the word.

The situation contained in the letter is extremely simple, but for all that the document has an important bearing on the disputed passage in 2 Thess. iii. 17.² St. Paul, we are told, has not in fact furnished all his letters with a salutation in his own hand, therefore the words "which is the token in every epistle" cannot be genuine. But the premise from which this argument starts is a sheer petitio principii. We must not say that St. Paul only finished off with his own hand those letters in which he expressly says that he did.³ Mystarion's letter, with its greeting and the rest of the conclusion in a different writing, namely in Mystarion's own hand, was written only a few years before St. Paul's second letter to the Christians of Thessalonica, and it proves that somebody at that date closed a letter in his own hand without expressly saying so.¹ It must not be forgotten that we can have no proper conception of what a letter was like unless we have seen the original; the copies in books and most certainly the printed editions have taken more from the letters of St. Paul than is generally suspected,² while on the other hand they have facilitated the discussion of problems that originated in the study as mere hallucinations of overtaxed brains. The soldier Apion, whose acquaintance we shall make in letters 9 and 10, had the unsophisticated man's natural feeling for the significance of the original handwriting of a letter: the mere sight of his father's handwriting makes him tender and affectionate. In much the same way a contrast of handwriting awakes in St. Paul a mood half jesting and half earnest.³

There follow, in a third and fourth hand, the signatures of the other officials to the same effect.

The handwriting of this document is interesting on account of the clear, almost literary uncials of the main text, sharply distinguished from the cursive signatures of the attesting officials. We must imagine this state of things reversed in the case of the Epistle to the Galatians; the handwriting of the amanuensis of Gal. i. 1-vi. 10 (or -v. 1) was probably cursive, and the autograph signature of St. Paul the stiff, heavy uncials of a manual labourer; the contrast was just as great. In regard to contents this text is one of the most important¹ evidences that the title Kyrios ("lord") was applied to the emperor as early as the reign of Nero. It is not the farmer Harmiysis who employs it, but the officials use it three times over in their formal signatures.

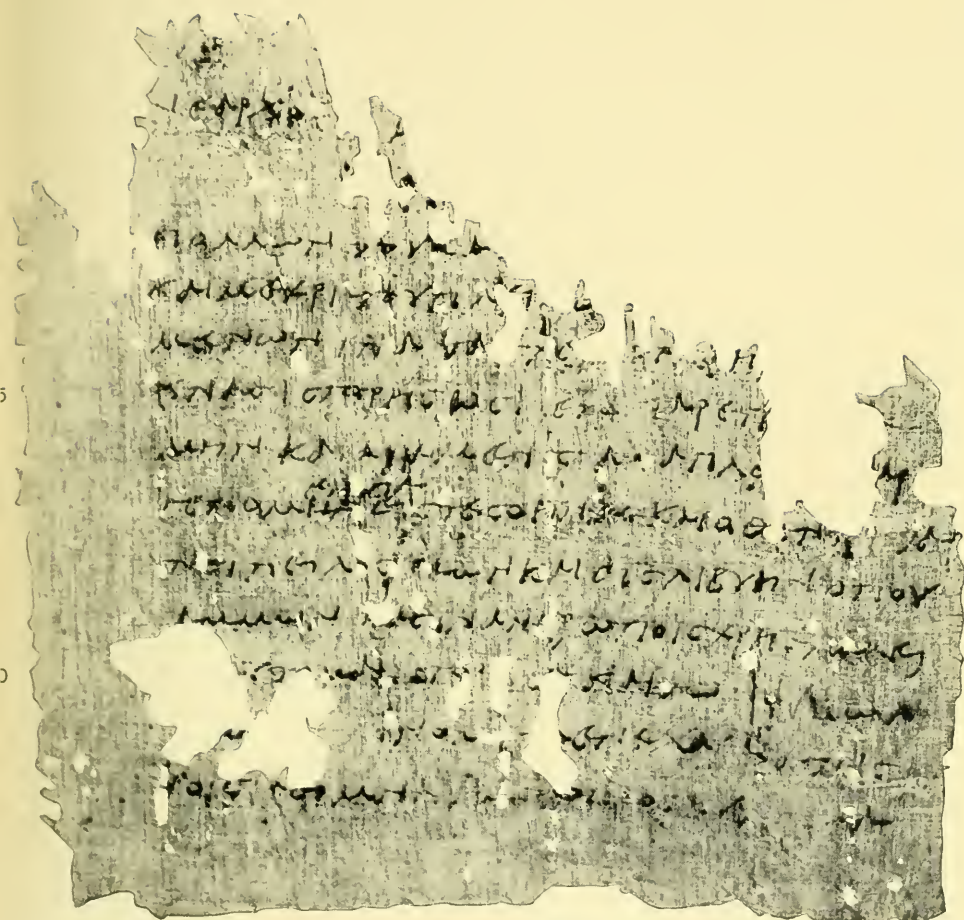

FIG. 22.—Letter from Nearchus, an Egyptian, to Heliodorus, 1st or 2nd cent. A.D. Papyrus from Egypt. Now in the British Museum. By permission of the Museum authorities.

This little fragment of a letter about travel is of great interest to the historian of civilisation. It also gives a good picture of the social piety which was already known to us from the assurances of mutual intercession in other papyrus letters. Nearchus¹ does not neglect to pray for his friends at the seats of grace, and, as if to make his intercession permanent, he inscribes their names on the temple walls.

The writer seems to be a man of the middle class, but his style, despite faint echoes of the book-language, is on the whole non-literary.²

Continuation of notes to p. 162:—

⁴ The papyrus has εἴσομα. The meaning would then be: "and I visited regions easily traversed" (in opposition to the difficult approach to the oasis). Hermann Diels (letter, Berlin W., 22 July, 1908) writes: "εἴσομα = arcana, mysteria, I take to be a reminiscence of the Αἰγυπτιακά of Herodotus (ii. 171), which then, as now, every traveller on the Nile had in his pocket."

⁵ Grenfell and Hunt's reading.

⁷ = Syene.

¹⁰ This refers either to the impressions of the journey in general or specially to a favourable oracle of the god Ammon.

² Preterite of the epistolary style.

³ The word was first taken as a proper name, Εὐμοίρῳ. But, as pointed out by E. J. Goodspeed, the article surely shows that the word is an adjective; cf. Wilcken, Archiv für Papyrusforschung, 4, p. 250. This interpretation is supported by the parallel τοῦ μακαρίου of the ancient letter-writer, cf. below (p. 166).

⁴ Equivalent, I think, to ἀλλήλους, as often in the N.T., e.g. Col. iii. 16.

sympathy. She can fully understand the grief of her friends; she weeps over again the tears that she shed before for her own lost one, the departed Didymas¹: personal sorrow has made her sympathetic with other people's trouble. She speaks therefore of her own tears first. But she must write more than that: it is to be a letter of consolation. Irene, who knows how to write a business letter quickly and surely,² experiences the difficulty of those whose business it is to console and who have no consolation to offer. And so she ponders over sentences to fill up the sheet: it will be a satisfaction to the mourners to hear that she and all her family have fulfilled all the duties of affection and decency that are customary in such cases.³ But after these lines full of names, slowly written by great effort, the genuine feeling in her heart breaks through, that despairing resignation which speaks of inevitable fates. And then, illogical and truly womanly, the concluding injunction, "Comfort ye one another!" Who could help feeling for the helplessness of this woman, whose own sympathy was assuredly so true?

Poor Irene! It is certainly with no wish to do her injustice that I call attention to the fact that similar formulae of consolation were common to the age. An ancient model letter-writer gives the following formulary⁴:—

³ Funeral offerings? Prayers? One would gladly know more.

⁴ Proclus, De forma epistolari, No. 21 (Epistolographi Graeci, rec. Hercher, p. 10). The authorship of this letter-writer has been sometimes attributed to Libanius, as well as to the Neo-Platonist Proclus (cf. Karl Krumbacher, Geschichte der byzantinischen Literatur,² München, 1897, p. 452, who rejects both attributions). I regard the text as a Christian adaptation of ancient models; cf. the Biblical intrusions noticed in the next footnote and in the formulary for a letter of contrition (see below, p. 181 on the letter of Antonis Longus).

The letter. The death of N. N., now blessed, hath grieved us exceedingly and constrained us to mourn and weep; for of such an earnest and altogether virtuous friend have we been bereaved. Glory then and praise be to God, who in wisdom and incomprehensible power and providence governeth the issues to death, and, when it is expedient, receiveth the soul unto Himself.

If the second half of this formulary shows signs of Biblical influence,¹ the first half is obviously ancient and secular. Irene's letter exhibits very similar formulae, the resemblance of the opening lines being particularly striking. But it is not mere imitation; the no doubt familiar formulae are animated by the personality of the writer, and we shall be justified in regarding even the concluding words of resignation as an expression of real feeling. That this feeling was a widespread one,² and that it produced similar thoughts in another formulary for a letter of consolation,³ need be no objection to the view we have taken.

St. Paul doubtless was thinking of such despairing souls in his letter to Thessalonica, when he inserted these words of comfort for the Christians in trouble for their dead⁴ :—

² Wilcken recalls a saying frequent in epitaphs, "No one is immortal."

⁴ 1 Thess. iv. 13.

“ But I would not have you to be ignorant, brethren, concerning them which are asleep, that ye sorrow not, even as others which have no hope.”

And then with all the realism of an ancient popular writer he unfolds a picture of the Christian's future hope, culminating in the certainty¹ :—

“ And so shall we ever be with the Lord.”

To which he immediately adds, in conclusion, the exhortation² :—

“ Wherefore, comfort one another with these words,” reminding us of the ending of Irene's letter of consolation,³ except that behind St. Paul's words there is not the resignation of the “ others ” but a victorious certitude, triumphing over death.

² 1 Thess. iv. 18.

secular custom when he so frequently began his letters with thanks to God (1 Thess. i. 2; 2 Thess. i. 3; Col. i. 3; Philemon 4; Eph. i. 16; 1 Cor. i. 4; Rom. i. 8; Phil. i. 3).

⁴ Serapis is called lord in countless papyri and inscriptions.

[For notes 8 to 21 see next page]

Apion, son of Epimachus, of the little Egyptian village of Philadelphia, has entered the Roman army as a soldier,¹ and after the farewells to father, brothers

⁹ The viaticum is aptly compared by Preisigke with the marching allowances in the German army. It consists of three pieces of gold (aurei) = 75 drachmae. Alfred von Domaszewski writes to me (postcard, Heidelberg, 6 August, 1908) : "The viaticum (cf. Corpus Inscriptionum Latinarum, VIII. No. 2557) is a stipendium."

¹⁰ Again the "Biblical" word.

¹¹ σωτηρία here means "welfare" in the external (not in the religious) sense, as in Acts xxvii. 34, Heb. xi. 7.

¹² χῆραν = χέρρα, with vulgar ν appended, like χέραν in John xx. 25, Codices N* AB; other examples in Blass, Grammatik des Neutestamentlichen Griechisch,² p. 27 [Eng. trans. p. 26].—By hand I think Apion means his father's handwriting, which will recall his father's presence. A specially fine touch in this letter of fine feeling.

¹³ προβάσαι no doubt = προβάψαι, "to advance," as in Gal. i. 14. The soldier is thinking of promotion.

¹⁴ The pious reservation "if the gods will" is frequent in pagan texts, cf. Neue Bibelstudien, p. 80; Bible Studies, p. 252.

¹⁶ Cf. the same epistolary formula in 1 Cor. xvi. 19.

²⁰ Philadelphia in the Fayûm.

²¹ The cohort mentioned in these instructions for delivery was stationed in Egypt (Preisigke, p. 102). The letter therefore went first of all from the garrison of Misenum to the garrison of this cohort (Wilcken: Alexandria), and the Liblarios (= librarius), i.e. accountant to the cohort, was then to forward it, as occasion should serve, to the village in the Fayûm.

and sisters, and friends, has taken ship (probably at Alexandria) for Misenum. Serenus, Turbo, and other recruits from the same village accompany him. The voyage is rough and dangerous. In dire peril of the sea the young soldier invokes his country's god, and the lord Serapis rescues him immediately. Full of gratitude, Apion reaches his first destination, the naval port of Misenum. It is a new world to the youth from the distant Egyptian village! Put into the centuria with the high-sounding name "Athenonica," with three pieces of gold in his pocket as viaticum, and proud of his new name Antonis Maximus, he immediately has his portrait painted for the people at home by some artist who makes a living about the barracks, and then writes off to his father a short account of all that has happened. The letter shows him in the best of spirits; a rosy future lies before Apion: he will soon get promotion, thanks to his father's excellent training. When he thinks of it all, of his father, and his brother, and his sister with her little daughter, and Capito and his other friends, his feelings are almost too much for him. If only he could press his father's hand once again! But father will send him a note in reply, and his father's handwriting will call up the old home. The letter is just about to be closed when his countrymen give him their greetings to send, and there is just room for them on the margin of the papyrus. Finally the letter must be addressed, and that is a little troublesome: in the army there are rules and regulations for everything, but to make up for it the soldier's letter will be forwarded by military post, and by way of the Liblarios' room of the first Apamenian cohort it will reach the father in safety.

Have I read too much between the lines of this letter? I think not. With letters you must read what is between the lines. But nobody will deny that this soldier's letter of the second century, with its fresh naïveté, rises high above the average level.

We possess further the original of a second, somewhat later letter by the same writer, addressed to his sister, which was also found in the Fayûm, and is now in the Berlin Museum. I believe I am able to restore a few lines additional to those already deciphered.

² The sister was named in the first letter. Her daughter, not being named in the second letter, had probably died meanwhile. It is not likely that Sabina was a second sister of the writer, because in the first letter only one sister is mentioned. The father too seems not to have been alive at the time of the second letter.

⁵ Copres is probably the brother-in-law.

⁶ So I have restored lines 18-21. I have altered nothing except πειν to πειπ in line 19. Επειπ is the month Ἐπεῖφ; for the spelling with final π cf. the examples in Wilcken, Griechische Ostraka, I. p. 809. καθ' Ἑλλήνας, "according to the Hellenic (i.e. not Egyptian) calendar," is a technical formula; cf. the 2nd cent. horoscope, Fayûm Towns and their Papyri, No. 139, καθ' Ἑλλήνας Μεσορῇ ε, and the editors' note; also Wilcken, Griechische Ostraka, I. p. 792 ff. The nominative τριακάς is grammatically unimpeachable, for it is a predicate and not a statement of time ("on the thirtieth"). Even in the latter case,

There follow 6 mutilated lines, obviously containing more salutations.

I imagine the situation in this second letter to be as follows :—

Years have passed. Apion, who has long ago discarded this name and now uses only his soldier-name Antonius Maximus, has taken a wife, called Aufidia. She presents him with two daughters, Elpis and Fortunata (the parents delight in beautiful names with a meaning), and at last the longed-for son and heir. His birthday, according to the Greek calendar, is 30 Epiph (24 July), and the soldier's child receives his father's splendid soldier-name, Maximus. Changes too have taken place at home, in the far-away little village of Philadelphia, in however, the nominative is occasionally left, e.g. Berliner Griechische Urkunden, No. 55, II₁₀ (161 A.D.), 64₁₄ (216–217 A.D.). For the prominence given to the birthday cf. for instance Berliner Griechische Urkunden, No. 333, 2nd or 3rd cent. A.D. (Bibelstudien, p. 215; not in Bible Studies).—W. Schubart informed me by letter (Berlin, 6 June, 1907) that my conjectures fit in well with the traces of letters remaining and with the size of the lacunae in the papyrus; he approves also, in spite of doubts suggested by the handwriting, the reading πειπ.

¹ Krebs wrote ἐλπίς and φόρτου. I regard both as proper names; of course one could also conjecture Fortunatus (cf. 1 Cor. xvi. 17). As the son Maximus has been already named, with special stress laid on his birthday, one is inclined to assume here that the writer had two daughters.

Egypt. The sister Sabina has lost her little daughter; Epimachus, father and lord, has also died; but Sabina and her husband Copres have got a little boy instead, who is named Maximus in honour of his soldier uncle: is not uncle's portrait, left them by grandfather, hanging on the wall? Sabina is the link between her brother and his old home. He writes as often as he can, and when he cannot write he remembers his sister daily before the gods of his garrison in brotherly intercession. But this is not his only connexion with home. An old friend in Philadelphia, Antoninus, has just written, and was kind enough to assure him of Sabina's being well.

That is the occasion of the letter to the sister. Written in a perfectly familiar strain, simply to impart family news and to convey all sorts of greetings, it nevertheless, like that other letter of richer content to the father, gives us a glimpse of the close net of human relationships, otherwise invisible, which the giant hands of the Roman army had woven with thousands of fine, strong threads and spread from coast to coast and from land to land over the enormous extent of the Mediterranean world at the time of the infancy of Christianity. In judging of the Roman army of the second century it is not without importance to know that among the human materials of which that mighty organism was composed, there were such attractive personalities as our friend Apion. Another soldier's letter (No. 12), given below, also permits favourable conclusions to be drawn.¹

FIG. 26.—Letter from a Prodigal Son, Antonis Longus, to his mother Nilus, 2nd cent. A.D. Papyrus from the Fayûm. Now in the Berlin Museum. By permission of the Directors of the Royal Museums.

There can be no doubt that this letter¹ is one of the most interesting human documents that have come to light among the papyri. This priceless fragment, rent like the soul of its writer, comes to us as a remarkably good illustration of the parable of the Prodigal Son (Luke xv. 11 ff.).² Others may improve on the first attempt at interpretation.

Antonis³ Longus to Nilus his mother many greetings. And continually do I pray that thou art in health. I make supplication for thee daily to the lord Serapis.⁵ I would thou shouldst understand⁶ that I had no hope that thou wouldst go up to the metropolis.⁸ And therefore I came not to the city. But I was ashamed to come to Caranis,¹² because I walk about in rags. I write [or "have written"¹³] to thee that I am naked. I beseech thee,¹⁴ mother, be reconciled to me.¹⁵ Furthermore, I know what I have brought upon myself. I have been chastened¹⁸ every way. I know that I have sinned.²⁰ I have heard from Postumus,²¹ who met thee in the country about Arsinoë and out of season told thee all things. Knowest thou not that I had rather be maimed than know that I still owe a man an obol? come thyself! I have heard that I beseech thee I almost I beseech thee I will not do otherwise

² If this letter had happened to be preserved in some literary work there would of course be a bundle of monographs, several pounds in weight, proving the parable to be derived from the letter, and many a doctoral dissertation would have been made out of it.

[For notes 3 to 21 see pp. 178 and 179]

Antonius Longus, of Caranis in the Fayûm, has quarrelled with his (widowed?)¹ mother Nilus and left the village. The cause of the dissension seems to have lain with the son—loose living, and running up debts. It fares ill with him in the strange country; he is in such wretched plight that his clothes fall from him in rags. In such a state, he

³ Antonis, short for Antonius, cf. letter 9 above.

⁸ The metropolis is perhaps Arsinoë.

says to himself with burning shame,¹ it is impossible for him to return home. But he must go back—he realises that, for he had soon come to his senses: all this misery he has brought upon himself by his own fault, and it is the well-deserved punishment. Full of yearning for home he remembers his mother in prayer daily to the lord Serapis, and hopes for

²⁰ Cf. the Prodigal Son, Luke xv. 18, 21, "Father, I have sinned."

²⁴ θέλω with following ἢ (papyrus ει), "I had rather . . . than . . .," is used exactly like this in 1 Cor. xiv. 19.

an opportunity of re-establishing communication with her. Then he meets an acquaintance of his, Postumus (?). He hears how Postumus (?) had met his mother in the Arsinoïte nome, as she was returning home from the metropolis, Arsinoë, (to Caranis,) and how the poor woman had hoped to find her son at the metropolis. Unfortunately Postumus (?) recounted to the disappointed mother the whole scandalous story of the runaway once more, reckoning up his debts for her edification to the last obol.

That is the occasion of the letter: gratitude to the mother for having looked for him, as he had not ventured to hope, in the metropolis—and anger at Postumus (?) the scandal-monger. The letter is dashed off in a clumsy hand and full of mistakes, for Antonius Longus has no practice in writing. The prodigal approaches his mother with a bold use of his pet name Antonis, and after a moving description of his misery there comes a complete confession of his guilt and a passionate entreaty for reconciliation. But in spite of everything, he would rather remain in his misery, rather become a cripple, than return home and be still one single obol in debt to the usurers. The mother will understand the hint and satisfy the creditors before the son's return. And then she is to come herself and lead her son back into an ordered way of life — — — — —
 “I beseech thee, I beseech thee, I will”
 —no more than this is recoverable of the remainder of the letter, but these three phrases in the first person are sufficiently characteristic. Antonius has a foreboding that there is still resistance to be overcome.¹

Astute persons and models of correct behaviour will tell us that the repentance of this black sheep was not genuine; that sheer poverty and nothing else wrung from him the confession of sin and the entreaty for reconciliation; that the lines assuring his mother of his prayers to Serapis were mere phrasing. But was not the prodigal's confession in the Gospel parable also dictated by his necessity? Jesus does not picture to us an ethical virtuoso speculating philosophically and then reforming, but a poor wanderer brought back to the path by suffering. Another such wanderer was Antonius Longus the Egyptian, who wrote home in the depths of his misery: "I beseech thee, mother, be reconciled to me! I know that I have sinned."

We see very plainly how genuine and true to life it all is when we compare the tattered papyrus sheet with a specimen letter of contrition, ship-shape and ready for use, as drafted by an ancient model letter-writer¹:—

ἡ ἐπιστολή. οἶδα σφαλεῖς
κακῶς σε διαθέμενος. διὸ με-ταγνοῦς τὴν ἐπὶ τῷ σφάλματι συγγνώμην αἰτῶ. μεταδοῦναι δέ μοι μὴ κατοκνήσης διὰ τὸν κύριον. δίκαιον γάρ ἐστι συγγνώσκειν πταίονσι τοῖς φίλοις, ὅτε μάλιστα καὶ ἀξιούσι συγγνώμης τυχεῖν.

The letter. I know that I erred in that I treated thee ill.
Wherefore, having repented, I beg pardon for the error. But for the Lord's sake² delay not to forgive me. For it is just to pardon friends who stumble, and especially when they desire to obtain pardon.³

The person who calls himself "I" in this letter is a lay-figure, and not even a well-made one; when

Antonis Longus says "I do this or that" a man of flesh and blood is speaking, and it would make no difference to the inward truth of his touching confessions if his "I know that I have sinned" were as much a current formula as the "I know that I erred." The prodigal had gone through experiences enough to animate even formulae into confessions.

*Letter from Aurelius Archelaus, beneficiarius, to Julius Domitius, military tribune, Oxyrhynchus, 2nd cent. A.D., papyrus, now in the Bodleian Library, Oxford, discovered and published by Grenfell and Hunt*¹ (Figure 27).

This letter is of great interest in various respects: as a good example of an ancient letter of recommendation,² as an early Latin letter, as a specimen of vulgar Latin³ of the date of the Muratorian Canon. Scholars of repute have even considered it to be a Christian letter—and if that were so its value, considering its age, would be unique.

I have retained the remarkable punctuation by means of stops. The clear division of the words should also be noticed.⁴

To Julius Domitius,¹ military tribune of the legion, from Aurelius Archelaus his beneficiarius, greeting.

Already aforetime I have recommended unto thee Theon my friend, and now also I pray, lord,² that thou mayest have³ him before thine eyes as myself.⁴ For he is such a man that he may be loved by thee.
For he left his own people, his goods and business, and followed me.⁶ And through all things he hath kept me in safety. And therefore I pray of thee that he may have entering in unto thee.⁷ And he is able to declare unto thee all things concerning our business.⁸ Whatsoever he hath told me, so it was in very deed.⁹ I have loved the man

⁶ Cf. Matt. xix. 27 = Mark x. 28 = Luke xviii. 28, "Lo, we have left all, and have followed Thee." Cf. also Matt. iv. 20, 22.

⁷ Cf. St. Paul, 1 Thess. i. 9, ὁποῖαν εἰσόδον ἔσχομεν πρὸς ὑμᾶς, "what manner of entering in we had unto you."

¹⁵ The address is written on fragment I.

The situation in this letter is quite clear, and needs no reconstruction. It is only necessary to say something about the theory, first advanced by N. Tamassia and G. Setti in collaboration,¹ and approved by P. Viereck,² that the letter was written by a Christian. In support of it we are referred to the various "Biblical" and especially "New Testament" echoes it contains, the chief being a striking parallel to the words of St. Peter, "Lo, we have left all, and have followed Thee." In conscious or unconscious recollection of these Gospel words, we are told, Archelaus writes of Theon that he had left his own people, his possessions, and business, and had followed him—so that Archelaus at least must be regarded as a Christian.³ There is certainly something alluring about this theory, but nevertheless I am not able to accept it. If Archelaus were a Christian it is extremely unlikely, I think, that he would have profaned St. Peter's words by applying them to the relations of an ordinary human friendship. The double concept of leaving and following is employed by St. Peter in the deepest sense of evangelical self-denial and refers to the disciples and the Master. But the expression "leave and follow" is quite likely to have been one of the stock phrases used in ancient letters of recommendation; in the Gospel it acquires ethical status. The other "Biblical" and particularly "Pauline" echoes are explainable in the same way. Archelaus was not acquainted with the Pauline Epistles,¹ but Paul and Archelaus were acquainted with the complimentary phraseology employed in ancient letter-writing.

To the historian of manners this letter of Aurelius Archelaus is a speaking testimony to the noble, unreserved humanity that was possible in the Roman army of the second century, even in the relations between a subordinate and his superior.

A delivery-order in letter-form, perfectly simple and unassuming, but interesting in style and language.

² So read by Hermann Diels (letter to the author, Berlin W., 22 July, 1908).

⁷ Meaning, as in the New Testament, a "female slave."

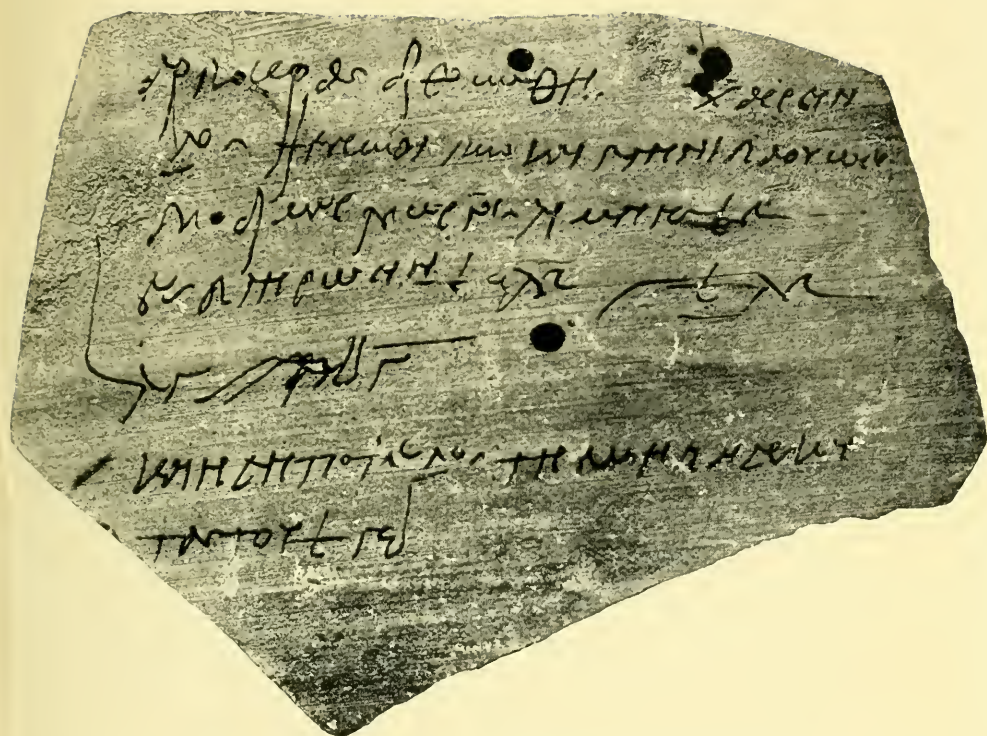

FIG. 28.—Letter from Harpocras, an Egyptian, to Phthomonthes, 29 December, 192 A.D. Ostracon from Thebes. Now in the Author's collection.

Letter from Theon, an Egyptian boy, to his father Theon, 2nd or 3rd cent. A.D., papyrus from Oxyrhynchus, now in the Bodleian Library, Oxford, discovered and published by Grenfell and Hunt ¹ (Figure 29).

This letter, written in a schoolboy's uncial hand, is of the highest importance for a variety of reasons: it is at once a picture of ancient family life, a portrait of a naughty boy drawn by himself, and a specimen of the most uncultivated form of popular speech. Blass's ² remark, that the boy "violates" grammar, is about as true as if I were to call a sloe-hedge a violation of the espalier. At the outset Theon had no grammar to suffer humiliation and violence at a later stage of his career. He had merely the language of the streets and the playground, and that language the rogue speaks also in his letter. The spelling too is "very bad," says Blass—as if the boy had been writing an examination exercise; but from this "bad" (really on the whole phonetic) spelling the Greek scholar can learn more than from ten correct official documents. The style I recommend to the consideration of all who are specialists in detecting the stylistic features characteristic of the Semitic race.

FIG. 29.—Letter from Theon, an Egyptian boy, to his father Theon, 2nd or 3rd cent. A.D. Papyrus from Oxyrhynchus. Now in the Bodleian Library, Oxford. Facsimile kindly obtained by Dr. Arthur S. Hunt.

hast sent me great¹ gifts—locust-beans.² They deceived³ us⁴ there on the 12th day, when thou didst sail. Finally,⁵ send for me, I beseech thee. If thou sendest not, I will not eat nor drink.⁶ Even so.⁷ Fare thee well, I pray. Tybi 18.

On the verso the address :

Deliver to Theon from Theonas⁸ his son.

A nice handful, this boy! He has wrought his mother to such a pitch that she is almost beside herself and has but one wish: "Away with him!" And the father is no better treated. Little Theon is determined at all costs to share in the journey to Alexandria planned by Theon the elder. There have already been several scenes about it, and the father, who has no need of the urchin on his long journey, can think of no other way out of the difficulty but to start on the voyage to the capital, Alexandria, under the pretext of a little trip "to the town" (probably Oxyrhynchus).⁹ This was on 7 January. The weak father's conscience pricks him for his treachery, and so he sends a little present to console the boy he has outwitted—some locust-beans.

for him to eat, which the father perhaps thought would be a treat for him so early in the year. But he was mistaken there. As day after day goes by and the father does not return from "the town," the victim sees through the plot. He knows now why he was not allowed to go with his father this time to "the town"; he sees now why he received the fine present—fine present indeed, why the poor people eat those locust-beans¹! Burning with rage, he sits down to write on 13 January. Having found out that his father was to stop somewhere en route, he composes this blackmailing letter we have before us. Impudent, ironical, with childish wilfulness he pours out his threats. He will stop doing everything that a well brought-up child should do to its parents—wishing them good-day, shaking hands, wishing them health, writing nice letters. Worst threat of all, he will starve to death of his own free will. That will bring daddy round, the device has never failed yet. And still with all his defiant naughtiness Theon can contrive a tolerable joke. His mother had cried in desperation to (his brother?) Archelaus, "He drives me mad, away with him," and Theon is quick-witted enough to turn this into an argument with his father for travelling to Alexandria after all! The same derisive artfulness is apparent in the address. On the outside of a letter bristling with impudence he has mischievously written as the name of the sender Theonas, the father's pet name for his pampered child.

Did Theon the elder, to whom such a letter could be written, do what the naughty boy wanted at last? The outlines which the son has unconsciously drawn of his father's portrait certainly do not encourage us to answer the question in the negative.

Letter from Pacysis, an Egyptian, to his son, about the 3rd cent. A.D., ostracon from Thebes, now in the author's collection, deciphered by U. Wilcken¹ (Figure 30).

| Πακῦσις Πατσέβθιο(ς) τῶ νίῳ μου χ(αίρειν). | Pacysis, the son of Pat- sebthis, to my son, greeting. |
| Μὴ ἀντιλογήσης. μετὰ στρατιώτου ² | Contradict not. Ye have dwelt there with a soldier. But re- ceive him not till I come to you. |
| [ὦι?]κήσατε <ἐ>κεῖ. μ[ηδ]ἐ παραδέ- [ξη αὐτὸ]ν, ἕως ἔλθω πρὸς ἡμᾶς ³ | |
| 5 [] ἔρρωσο. | Farewell. |

In its wretchedly sorry state this greatly faded ostracon is a typical example of a poor man's letter in ancient times. Theon, the father whose acquaintance we made in the last letter, was obviously better off, but would he, we wonder, ever have been able, like Pacysis, in dealing with his son to use such a wholesomely rough expression as "Contradict not"?

² The punctuation is doubtful. I at first thought of reading μὴ ἀντιλογήσης μετὰ στρατιώτου, "dispute not with a soldier," when μετὰ would be used as it is frequently in the New Testament and elsewhere after πολεμέω.

Letter from an Egyptian Christian at Rome to his fellow-Christians in the Arsinoïte nome, between 264 (265) and 282 (281) A.D., papyrus from Egypt (probably the Fayûm), formerly in the collection of Lord Amherst of Hackney at Didlington Hall, Norfolk, published by Grenfell and Hunt¹ (Figure 31).

This papyrus is at present the oldest known autograph letter in existence from the hand of a Christian, and in spite of being badly mutilated it is of great value.

From external characteristics the fragment was dated between 250 and 285 A.D. by Grenfell and Hunt, who deciphered and first published it, and their chronology has been brilliantly confirmed by an observation of Harnack's.² He found that the "pope Maximus" mentioned in the letter was Bishop Maximus of Alexandria, who was in office from 264 (265) to 282 (281) A.D.

Little has yet been done towards the restoration of the text. Two other texts contained on the same precious fragment have from the first somewhat diverted attention from the letter itself. A few lines from the beginning of the Epistle to the Hebrews have been written above the second column of the letter in an almost contemporary hand,³ while on the back Dr. J. Rendel Harris was the first to recognise a fragment of Genesis i. 1-5 in Aquila's translation preceded by the Septuagint parallel in a handwriting of the age of Constantine.

² Sitzungsberichte der Königlich Preussischen Akademie der Wissenschaften zu Berlin, 1900, p. 987 ff. Harnack thinks there is much to be said for the theory that the papyrus contains two letters. Then, I think, we should have to assume that the fragment was a leaf of the writer's letter copy-book (cf. below, p. 227, the remarks on Rom. xvi.). But the most probable assumption is that we have only one letter here.

So far as I know C. Wessely¹ is the only one who has attempted to restore the missing parts of the letter. My own attempt, here given,² agrees in several places independently with his. I feel obliged to point out that parts of the attempted restoration of the text are extremely hypothetical. But combined effort is necessary for the solution of such tasks, and I should be the first to discard these conjectures in favour of better ones.

COLUMN I

contains the remains of 10 lines, not deciphered by Grenfell and Hunt. A re-examination of the original is greatly to be desired, but merely from the facsimile I should not venture to say anything.

⁶ Grenfell and Hunt cite from Epicharmus άών as the name of a fish. They observe—very rightly—that this is not likely to be the word here. We may assume with Wessely that ὀθόνας was the word intended (cf. column III). Hermann Diels writes to me (Berlin W., 22 July, 1908): "ὀθόνας is suggested by the sense, but there is not room enough for it. Is it possible that the word there was ἄβνας (vestimenta), the same which has hitherto defied explanation in Bacchylides 17 (16), 112?"

⁸ This and the corresponding line in column III are written in another hand than the body of the letter. Cf. above, pp. 153, 158 f.

⁹ After καλῶς ποιεῖν we have here as in Theon's letter (No. 14 above) not the infinitive, but a paratactic participle; similar constructions in the Oxyrhynchus Papyri, No. 113_{6f}, and 116_{5f},¹⁴ (both letters of the 2nd cent. A.D.). The use is, however, much older, as shown by the letter (Hibeh Papyri, No. 82_{17f}, c. 238 B.C.) quoted above, p. 83, note 6.

³ For this conjecture cf. l. 16 of the letter of Psenosiris, No. 17 below, ὅταν ἐλθῃ σὺν θεῷ. The formula σὺν θεῷ, "with God," occurs frequently elsewhere. The writer of this letter fulfils almost literally the injunction in the Epistle of St. James iv. 13 ff. not to say, "To-day or to-morrow we will go into such a city . . . and trade, and get gain," without adding, "If the Lord will and we live."

COLUMN II

And though I made excuses and delays and puttings off, I think not that he³ thus desired these things⁴ without cause. And even if now this superfluity⁵ which hath happened should not make a reckoning [possible], for the sake of [my own] good feelings⁶ I will gladly endure⁷ to pay. But if . . . they have again sold loaves, . . . in a little while happen to . . . Nilus⁸ and [my?] father Apollonis⁹ in A . . . And they have written that the money shall be delivered unto you immediately. Which also bring ye down to Alexandria, having bought linen among you in the Arsinoïte [nome]. For I have covenanted this with Primitinus, that the money shall be delivered unto him at Alexandria. [Year]//, Pauni 8,¹⁰ from Rome.

COLUMN III

Ye shall do well,¹¹ therefore, brethren, having bought the linen cloth. Then let some of you take the . . . and set forth

¹ Hence we may conclude that dealings in corn are in the background of this letter.

² I.e. Primitinus, who was then also in Rome.

⁴ Payment of the money in Alexandria instead of Rome.

⁶ Cf. the last lines of column III. The writer wants to have his conscience clear towards Primitinus.

⁷ The word is no doubt used playfully. Wilcken proposes: "yet I will gladly make the sacrifice for the sake of decency."

⁹ Apollonis is short for Apollonius. Harnack assumed that "Father" was the title of the provincial bishop, and took Apollonius to be the bishop of the particular church in the Arsinoïte nome (p. 991; cf. also his Geschichte der altchristlichen Literatur, II. 2, p. 180). This does not seem to me very probable. I rather think that the writer is speaking of his real father (and possibly of his sister just before).

¹¹ In the Greek text the verb is in the participle, through the carelessness of the writer in haste.

with it¹ unto Maximus the Papas and . . . the Lector. And having sold that linen cloth in Alexandria, deliver the money unto Primitinus or² Maximus the Papas, receiving a quittance from him. But the gain, the price of the bread sold by you and the money for the linen cloth, let him commit and deliver it up unto Theonas,³ in order that I, being come with God to Alexandria,⁴ may find it [ready] against my charges. Neglect not, therefore, brethren, to do this speedily, lest Primitinus, on account of the time appointed of me,⁵ should tarry in Alexandria, being about to sail for Rome,⁶ but that, as he hath profited us by dealings with the Papas and the most holy rulers who are before him, I may pay him thanks and determine all things in agreement for you and Agathobulus.⁷ Fare ye well, I pray⁸

Let us now attempt to make out the situation in this venerable document. A hint will be sufficient reminder that, so far as the restored portion of the text is concerned, the attempt must remain questionable.

We might place as a motto at the head of this, the earliest Christian letter of which the original has come down to us, the words which Tertullian⁹

² If Primitinus has not yet arrived at Alexandria.

⁵ The date arranged with Primitinus for the payment of the money.

wrote two generations earlier: "We do business in ships . . . we follow husbandry, and bear our part in buying and selling." The Christians of the generation before the great tempest of Diocletian persecution, whom we can here watch going about their work from our hidden post of observation, took their stand in the world, not alone praying for their daily bread, but also trading in it; "they bought, they sold."

Christians,¹ living somewhere in the fertile Arsinoïte nome² of Egypt, have far away at Rome³ a confidential agent whose name we do not know, but whose letter and Greek we have before us in the original: rude clumsy characters in the main text of the letter, a somewhat more flowing hand in the concluding lines (perhaps in the agent's autograph), the spelling uncultivated as of the people, the syntax that of the unlearned. This agent is supported perhaps by another, Agathobulus.⁴ They are entrusted with the dispatch of certain business connected with corn.⁵

An almost contemporary letter written from Rome by one Irenaeus to his brother Apolinarius, who also resided in the Arsinoïte nome,⁶ gives us a vivid picture of the kind of business. The man landed in Italy on the 6th of the month Epiph, finished unloading the corn-ship on the 18th Epiph, went on 25th Epiph to Rome, "and the place received us as God willed."⁷ After that, it is true, ⁶ Berliner Griechische Urkunden, No. 27.

⁷ This phrase has led people to regard the letter as a Christian one. The question, in spite of Wilcken's decision in the negative (Archiv für Papyrusforschung, 4, p. 208 f.), is still open; the other letters of the same circle of correspondents do not prove that Irenaeus was a pagan. It is not altogether

Irenaeus had to wait day after day for the conclusion of his business: "to this present day not one (of us) has finished this business of the corn."

Such no doubt was the sort of work that the writer of our letter had to do, and he was dealing just now with a man named Primitinus,¹ to whom he had to pay money.² That cannot very well be money for corn, for it is to be assumed that the people of Egypt sold corn rather than bought it. Primitinus might be a shipowner, claiming the cost of freightage of the corn. In that case it is not surprising that he is now in Rome, now in Alexandria.³ At the present time he is expected at Alexandria or is already there,⁴ but will return to Rome before long.⁵ First, however, he will receive his money at Alexandria: so he had arranged at Rome with the writer of the letter.⁶ The latter would have preferred some other mode of settlement, and had therefore at first tried all sorts of expedients,⁷ but he came at last to the conviction that Primitinus had his good reasons,⁸ and the writer of the letter is now greatly concerned to keep his agreement with the man. For to him, the Alexandrian shipowner, the Christians of the Arsinoïte nome are indebted for their close relations with the Papas of Alexandria, Maximus, the Lector —, and other ecclesiastical dignitaries in the great city.⁹ And although the good harvest has greatly stimulated the trade in corn, and the settlement of the bill might still perhaps be postponed to some quieter time,¹⁰ he impossible that Irenaeus also was an agent of the Christian corn-merchants of the Arsinoïte nome: he speaks of a number of colleagues. The letter is dated 9 Mesore (2 August).

If, however, the Arsinoïtes do send people⁴ on the journey to Alexandria, to pay Primitinus, as good business men they must not neglect to make a little money at the same time. They must take with them home-grown linen⁵ and sell it in the capital⁶; then, after Primitinus is paid,⁷ there will remain a tidy balance,⁸ which, with the profit from other ventures,⁹ they must hand over to the Papas Maximus,¹⁰ that is in reality to his steward Theonas,¹¹ to hold as a deposit for the use of the writer of the letter when he presently returns, God willing, to Alexandria.¹² This is perhaps not the first time that they have laid up such "stores"¹³ at Alexandria.

To the ecclesiastical historian this is the most interesting part of the letter: Egyptian provincial Christians employ the highest ecclesiastic in the country as their confidential agent in money affairs! The link between the Christian corn-sellers in the Fayûm and their agent in Rome is no casual exchanger, intent on his share of profit, but the Papas of Alexandria! This is certainly not a bad indication of the way in which the scattered churches held together socially, and of the willingness of the ecclesiastical leaders to help even in the worldly affairs of their co-religionists.

And so this oldest of Christian letters preserved in the original, although it contains, thank God, not a word of dogma, is still an extraordinarily valuable record of Christianity in the days before Constantine—quite apart from its external value as an historical document, which Harnack has already demonstrated to satisfaction. Certainly this papyrus was not unworthy of the impressive lines from the Greek Old and New Testaments which were afterwards written on it, and inscribed with which it has come down to our own day.

This “original document from the Diocletian persecution” was made the subject of a special investigation by me in 1902.³ The copious literature to which the precious fragment has given rise since then has been already noted,⁴ and I will only add here that I have been confirmed in my theory of the letter by the agreement of almost all the subsequent writers.⁵ I here reprint the text with a few improvements, which do not affect my explanation of the letter, and with the corresponding *Letter from Caor, Papas of Hermupolis, to Flavius Abinnaeus, an officer at Dionysias in the Fayûm, c. 346 A.D., papyrus from Egypt, now in the British Museum, published by Kenyon*¹ (Figure 34).

This little letter is one of the finest among the papyri. The situation resembles that in St. Paul's letter to Philemon, and the letter from the Papas to the officer can also be compared in contents with that beautiful little letter of the Apostle's, though the Papas is not fit to hold a candle to St. Paul.

The letter forms part of the correspondence of Flavius Abinnaeus, a Christian officer, who about the middle of the fourth century A.D. was praefectus castrorum of the camp of auxiliary cavalry at Dionysias in the Arsinoïte nome. Important alike in respect to the history of civilisation, of language, and of the Christian religion, this correspondence consists of some sixty original papyrus letters, some long, some short, some at London and some at Geneva, and still, in spite of excellent provisional publications by

See Dittenberger's notes, 7 and 10. Wilcken considers it to be popular Greek.

FIG. 34.—Letter from Caor, Papas of Hermupolis, to Flavius Abinnaeus, an officer at Dionysias in the Fayûm. Papyrus, circa 346 A.D. Now in the British Museum. By permission of the Museum authorities.

Kenyon¹ and Nicole,² awaiting a collective edition.³ The earliest dated letter in this priceless collection was written in the year 343, the most recent in 351 A.D.

Among the numerous unknown persons who have come to life again as correspondents of Abinnaeus in this collection one of the most remarkable is the writer of the present letter, Caor, Papas of Hermupolis. Like Kenyon⁴ I at first took him to be a bishop, understanding the word Papas in the same way as in the Christian letter from Rome.⁵ But I was unable to answer the difficult question, which Hermupolis could then be meant? Lines 9 and 10 would suit neither Hermupolis Magna nor Hermupolis Parva, the only sees of this name; such an expression as we have there could only be used by somebody who lived not far from the residence of the addressee. I talked the matter over with my friend Wilcken, and he reminded me that several other letters in the correspondence of Abinnaeus were written from a village called Hermupolis, in the south-west of the Fayûm, which is mentioned in the papyri from the Ptolemaic age down to the seventh century A.D.⁶ It then seemed to me that the obvious thing was to identify the Hermupolis of our papyrus with this village, and to regard the Papas not as a bishop but as a simple priest. The word Papas was applied in early times to village priests,¹ so there is no difficulty in so understanding it here. This degradation of the writer of the letter in no way detracts from the value of the letter. Of the bishops of the fourth century we already knew more than enough; in Caor, who calls himself "pope," but is no pope, we rejoice to meet a representative of village Christianity, and we range him beside Psenosiris, presbyter in the Oasis a generation earlier.

Whether the "Pope" of Hermupolis was master of the Greek language seems to me to be a doubtful question. The good man was certainly not learned; indeed, his syntax is so rudimentary and his orthography so autocratic that many a rude soldier's letter shows to advantage beside this of the Papas.

¹ In the Theologische Literaturzeitung, 27 (1902) col. 360, Harnack notes the earliest passage known to him: in the Martyrium Theodoti a Galatian village-priest is called Papas. This passage is no doubt older than our papyrus. (H. D[elehaye], however, in the Analecta Bollandiana, 27, p. 443, considers that the Martyrium is not so old.) Cf. further the Thesaurus Graecae Linguae, s.v. Πάπας. The differentiation, there shown to be as old as Eustathius of Thessalonica (Opuscula, p. 38, l. 58, about 1200 A.D.), between πάπας the distinguished bishop and παπᾶς the insignificant presbyter is probably mere learned trifling. The history of the meaning of the word Papas is highly interesting. The question is, whether the grand word (for bishop or even archbishop or pope) degenerated, so that it could be applied to every presbyter, or whether an originally vulgar word was gradually ennobled. Looking merely at the comparative frequency of the word in its two meanings, one would be inclined to suppose that degeneration had occurred. But the facts of the case were probably the other way round: the word πάπας, a native of Asia Minor (A. Dieterich, Eine Mithrasliturgie erläutert, Leipzig, 1903, p. 147), was probably first adopted from the popular Christianity of Asia Minor, and rose only gradually to its narrower and more distinguished meaning. Cf. U. von Wilamowitz-Moellendorf, Griechisches Lesebuch, II. 2 (Erläuterungen),² Berlin, 1902, p. 260; and A. Margaret Ramsay in Sir W. M. Ramsay's Studies in the History and Art of the Eastern Provinces, p. 27. If we now possess more examples of the grand meaning than of the other, that is because documents of popular Christianity have not been preserved in such numbers as those of the higher class (cf. the conclusion of this chapter, p. 242 f.). There is therefore philological justification for the old saying that the pettiest priestling conceals a popeling. [The German proverb says, "Es ist kein Pfäfflein so klein, Es steckt ein Pöpstlein drein"—"No priestling so mean But hides a popeling, I ween." TR.]

Perhaps the man's mother-tongue and language for ordinary occasions was Coptic¹; Greek he had learnt in a very vulgar form, and, good or bad, he made the best use he could of it. But I cannot help feeling that this violence to grammar, which would be unendurable in a book, is really not so bad in a letter, especially in this letter : it merely serves to strengthen the tone of unaffected sincerity.

What is the letter all about? Paul, one of the soldiers of the garrison under Abinnaeus, has been entrusted with some commission to execute,² and has failed to return to his commanding officer. After more or less vagabondage the deserter tires of the business and would like to go back. But how is he to set about it? how escape the punishment that is certainly in store for him? Then at Hermupolis he makes a village-priest his confidant and intercessor, promising by all that is sacred that he will behave better in future. The Papas is in some doubt about the case; perhaps he knows the ecclesiastical ordinances dating from the concordat between church and state, by which deserters are to be visited with ecclesiastical penalties, and he is not sure whether the man's good resolutions may be trusted. But the pastor triumphs over the man of ecclesiastical discipline, and he good-naturedly gives the deserter this note to take with him. If his Greek is not unexceptionable, his command of the epistolary formulae of an age of growing formalism is at least as good as that of the polite and unctuous Justinus.³ Without further argument he throws into the scale for Paul his personal friendship with Abinnaeus and his children, and then at once ventures to ask for a pardon. "This once" is delightful, and the pastor, foreseeing the weakness of the flesh, must have smiled as he wrote "if he desist not." The officer, who knows the fellow, is intended to smile too, in spite of his wrath, and it may be that Paul will after all go scot free.

This little genre painting gains in interest when we remember that the treatment of deserters was a problem that occupied the early church and even led to a conciliar decree. In the year 314 the Council of Arles determined "that those who throw down their arms in time of peace shall be excommunicate."¹ Caor the Papas of Hermupolis, however, solved the problem in his own way—and, I think, not badly.

This and the following Coptic ostracon, of the period preceding the tremendous upheaval that Islam brought upon Egypt, may close our selection of letters. The Bishop Abraham to whom the first ostracon is addressed, and who probably caused the second to be written, Crum¹ conjectures with good reasons to be identical with the Bishop of Hermonthis who is known from his will, now extant on papyrus² in the British Museum, to have been living as an anchorite on the Divine Hill of Memnonia near Thebes, and who died most probably towards the end of the 6th cent. priests,¹ have been requested² and have written this tablet³ and am witness.

One wonders what the episcopal archives of the holy father Apa Abraham can have looked like, destined to contain such potsherd petitions as this.⁴ Probably they were as primitive as the potsherd itself, as primitive as the intellectual equipment of the three prospective ecclesiastics, Samuel, Jacob, and Aaron, who have displayed the extent of their learning, ability, and ambition on this ostrakon. We ought rather to say, they got the least of all presbyters, Paternute, to display it for them, for—there is no concealing it—they themselves could perhaps only read, and not write at all.

The three worthies are about to be ordained deacons; but before the “hand” of the bishop “is on them” they must fulfil the requirements of the sacred ordinances.⁵ They must be prepared, firstly to keep the commandments⁶ and rules,⁷ secondly to obey their superiors, thirdly “to watch their beds”⁸ on communion days, fourthly to abjure commerce and take no usury, and fifthly to fulfil the duty of residence. All this, however, I expect, troubled them less than a special condition which the bishop had imposed upon them. Apa Abraham had set other candidates to learn the

Gospel according to Matthew,¹ or according to Mark,² or a gospel,³ or a whole gospel⁴ by heart, or to write out the Gospel according to John⁵; Bishop Aphu of Oxyrhynchus once required of a candidate for deacon's orders five-and-twenty Psalms, two Epistles of St. Paul, and a portion of a gospel to be learnt by heart⁶; and the task assigned to our three friends was to learn by heart the Gospel according to John by the end of Whitsuntide and practise reciting it.⁷ Failing this, they could not be ordained. This stipulation presupposes some sort of examination by the bishop before ordination. The sureties produced by the candidates—three by one candidate, and two each by the others—are again in accordance with the ecclesiastical regulations.⁸

A singular revelation of sorry circumstances this potsherd letter must be to those who imagine that three hundred years after the triumph of Christianity all the young clergy of Egypt would be theologians gifted with the knowledge of an Origen. But there can be no talk of a decline of learning in the case: the average education of the clergy probably never had been greater in this remote country district. And Bishop Abraham of Hermonthis, with his

⁶ Evidence in Crum, p. 9, where still more examples are given.

sympathy for the life of an anchorite, was not likely to be the man to raise the standard of learning among his people. The numerous documents from his hand, or from his chancery, written on the material used by the very poorest, and published by Crum, show him to have been a practical man, and particularly a man of discipline.

Letter probably from Bishop Abraham of Hermonthis (?) in Egypt to the clergy of his diocese, c. 600 A.D., Coptic ostracon from Egypt, now in the possession of the Egypt Exploration Fund, published by Crum¹ (Figure 36).

There may be some doubt concerning the persons to whom this episcopal letter was sent. It deals with the excommunication of a certain Psate, who was guilty of some misconduct towards the poor. The letter might therefore have been addressed to Psate's own church, but it is equally possible that copies of the letter of excommunication were sent to all the churches in the diocese.²

The question, What was Psate guilty of? depends on the interpretation of μαυλίζω, a word borrowed from the Greek, which keeps on recurring in the letter. It is difficult to say³ what its meaning is here. The lexicographer Hesychius says it means "to act as pander,"⁴ and in this sense it occurs according to Johannes Baptista Cotelerius in the Nomocanon edited by him.¹ It is, however, a question whether it has not a wider meaning there, something like “to bring into misery.”² In an old Greek penitentiary³ the word occurs in a question of the father confessor, probably in the meaning “to seduce.” I know no other instances of the use of the word. In the case of this ostrakon the meanings “act as pander” and “seduce,” as Crum and Carl Schmidt pointed out, do not suit particularly well, although they are not absolutely impossible. I conjecture the wider meaning “oppress,” “bring into misery,” and I have employed it⁴ in the following translation by Carl Schmidt.

This episcopal letter, which we may regard as a kind of letter of excommunication, has nothing particularly original about it. It is quite certain that practically all of it is well-worn material, and that even the monotonous formulae of excommunication are borrowed.¹ But this record of episcopal discipline was most certainly intelligible to common folk and effective with them, and in the severity against Psate, who had wronged "the poor," we see the survival of a sentiment thoroughly characteristic of the primitive Christians.

4. In the foregoing pages we have put together a collection of one-and-twenty letters of ancient date. Had we merely printed the text of the letters, and nothing more, a casual reader might have supposed as he turned the pages that he had before him fragments of ancient literature. Witkowski's magnificent collection of letters of the Ptolemaic age, which happens to be included in Teubner's "Bibliotheca Scriptorum Graecorum et Romanorum," is no doubt placed by many purchasers without further thought on the same shelf as the other Scriptores. A glance, however, at the facsimiles of the original letters will banish at once in almost every case the thought of literature: no page of an ancient book ever looked like that letter of Antonis Longus to his mother Neilus, or like the ostracon addressed by the three candidates to Bishop Abraham. And whoever goes on to make himself acquainted with the contents of the texts will see still more clearly that he has before him not products of literary art but documents of life, and that Mnesiergus, Hilarion, and Apion are not Scriptores, nor is even Psenosiris, although that little letter of his, snatched from the dust of the Great Oasis, already figures in two histories of literature. Though we have printed them in a book, these ancient texts have nothing to do with books and things bookish. They are non-literary—most of them popular as well as non-literary—admirably adapted to familiarise us with the essential characters of popular and non-literary writing, and with the character of the non-literary letter in particular.

What is a letter? A letter is something non-literary, a means of communication between persons who are separated from each other. Confidential and personal in its nature, it is intended only for the person or persons to whom it is addressed, and not at all for the public or any kind of publicity. A letter is non-literary, just as much as a lease or a will. There is no essential difference between a letter and an oral dialogue; it might be described as an anticipation of the modern conversation by telephone, and it has been not unfairly called a conversation halved.¹ It concerns nobody but the person who wrote it and the person who is to open it. From all other persons it is meant to be a secret. Its contents may be as various as life itself, and hence it is that letters preserved from ancient times form a delightful collection of the liveliest instantaneous photographs of ancient life. The form of the letters also varies greatly; but in the course of centuries a number of formal peculiarities were developed, and we not infrequently find the same forms becoming stereotyped into formulae in civilisations apparently quite independent of one another. But neither contents, form, nor formulae can be decisive in determining the characteristic nature of a letter. Whether the letter is written on lead or on earthenware, on papyrus or parchment, on wax or on palm-leaf, on pink notepaper or on an international postcard, is as immaterial as whether it is clothed in the conventional formulae of the period. Whether it is well expressed or badly, long or short, written by a soldier or a bishop, that does not alter the peculiar characteristic which makes it a letter.¹ Nor are the special contents any more decisive: the cool business letter of Harpocras, the impudent boyish scrawl of Theon, and the sanctimonious begging-letter of Justinus are distinguished from the coarseness of Hilarion and the despair of Antonis Longus only by the tone and the spirit in which they are written.

If the non-literary character of the letter, especially the ancient letter, has not always been clearly grasped, the explanation and excuse lie in the fact that even Aristotle's letters, the saying that "a letter is the half of a conversation." See further in Bibelstudien, p. 190; Bible Studies, p. 3 ff. Aurelius Archelaus, the beneficiarius whose letter we have cited above (No. 12), also knows this comparison of a letter with a conversation: "hanc epistulam ant' oculos habeto, domine, puta[t]o me tecum loqui." This beautiful simile was therefore quite a popular one.

in antiquity the form of the non-literary letter was occasionally employed for literary purposes. At the time of the rise of Christianity the literary letter, the epistle as we call it,¹ had long been a favourite genre with writers among the Greeks, Romans, and Jews.

What is an epistle? An epistle is an artistic literary form, a species of literature, just like the dialogue, the oration, or the drama. It has nothing in common with the letter except its form; apart from that one might venture the paradox that the epistle is the opposite of a real letter. The contents of an epistle are intended for publicity—they aim at interesting “the public.” If the letter is a secret, the epistle is cried in the market; every one may read it, and is expected to read it: the more readers it obtains, the better its purpose will be fulfilled. The main feature of the letter, viz. the address and the detail peculiar to the letter, becomes in the epistle mere external ornament, intended to keep up the illusion of “epistolary” form. Most letters are, partly at least, unintelligible unless we know the addressees and the situation of the sender. Most epistles are intelligible even without our knowing the supposed addressee and the author. To attempt to fathom the soul of a letter-writer is always venturesome; to understand what an epistolographer has written is apprentice-work by comparison. The epistle differs from a letter as the dialogue from a conversation, as the historical drama does from history, as the carefully turned funeral oration does from the halting words of consolation spoken by a father to his motherless child—as art differs from nature. The letter is a piece of life, the epistle is a product of literary art.

Of course there are things intermediate between letter and epistle. There are so-called letters in which the writer ceases to be naïve, perhaps because he thinks himself a celebrity and casts a side-glance at the public between every word, coquettishly courting the publicity to which his lines may some day attain. “Letters” such as these, epistolary letters, half intended for publication, are bad letters; with their frigidity, affectation, and vain insincerity¹ they show us what a real letter should not be.

5. A large number of examples of both groups, letters and epistles, have come down to us from antiquity.

For a letter to become public and reach posterity is, strictly speaking, abnormal. The letter is essentially ephemeral, transitory as the hand that wrote it or the eyes for which it was destined.² But thanks to loving devotion, or learning, or accident, or spite, we possess and may read letters that were not addressed to us. At an early date it became the custom after the death of eminent men to collect their manuscript remains. The first case of the publication of such a collection of real letters among the Greeks is considered to be that of Aristotle's, soon after his death in 322 B.C. Whether fragments of this genuine collection are preserved among the "Letters of Aristotle"¹ that have come down to us, is a matter of question. The traditionary letters of Isocrates² († 338 B.C.) are probably to some extent genuine, and the letters of Plato have been recently, in part at least, pronounced genuine by eminent scholars. Authentic letters of Epicurus († 270 B.C.) have also come down to us, among them a fragment of a delightfully natural little letter to a child,³ comparable with Luther's celebrated letter to his son Hänsichen.⁴ We may mention further one example among the Latins.⁵ Cicero († 43 B.C.) wrote an enormous number of letters, four collections of which have come down to us. Still more valuable to us in many respects than these letters of great men are the numerous letters of unknown persons which the new discoveries have brought to light, and of Sächsischen Gesellschaft der Wissenschaften, Bd. XX. No. III.), Leipzig, 1901, supplies a great deal of material, but suffers from lack of a distinction between letter and epistle, isolates "Roman" literature too rigidly, describes the suppression of individuality as a characteristic feature of classical antiquity, and judges the men of the period far too much according to the accidental remains of classical literature. Cf. my review in the Theologische Literaturzeitung, 27 (1902) cols. 41 ff.—I have not seen Loman's Nalatenschap, I., Groningen, 1899, pp. 14-42; cf. G. which we have already given a selection in this book. They possess the inestimable advantage that they have come down to us in the autograph original, and that their writers had not the slightest thought of future publication, so that they constitute a completely unprejudiced testimony on the part of the forgotten writers. They not only yield valuable evidence regarding the nature and form of the ancient letter,¹ they are also instructive to those who study the nature and form of Biblical and early Christian letters.²

² Adolf Schmitthenner says (Die Christliche Welt, 15, 1901, col. 731): “Printed letters are really a self-contradiction. A letter implies pen and ink, the one person who writes it, the other to whom it is written, and nothing more. It is a substitute for intercourse by word of mouth. Such intercourse ends with the spoken word and leaves no trace, save in our inward being. Should it not be the same also with that which takes its place? Ought we not from time to time to burn all our correspondence?—We do not.” [Schmitthenner was a Heidelberg pastor and story-writer of distinction, 1854–1907. TR.]

It is not surprising that we possess so many specimens of ancient epistles. As an artistic literary form the epistle has no intention of being transitory. Being published from the first in a considerable number of copies it cannot so easily perish as a letter, of which there is only one or at most two copies made. It is moreover a very easily manageable form of literature. It knows no rigid laws of style; it is only necessary to employ the few epistolary flourishes and then affix an address. Hence it comes that every man of letters, even the least well-fitted, was able to write epistles, and the epistle became one of the most popular genres. Right down to the present day it has remained a favourite in all literatures. Of ancient epistolographers there are, for instance, Dionysius of Halicarnassus and Plutarch among the Greeks, L. Annaeus Seneca and the younger Pliny among the Romans, to say nothing of the poetical epistles of Lucilius, Horace, and Ovid. The epistle was especially frequent in the literature of magic and religion. Nor must we forget mention of one special feature in the literary history, i.e. pseudonymous (or rather "heteronymous") epistolography. Particularly under the successors of Alexander and in the early Empire numerous epistles were written under false names, not by swindlers, but by unknown men of letters who for some reason or other did not wish to mention their own names. They wrote "letters" of Demosthenes, of Aristotle and Alexander, of Cicero and Brutus. It would be a mistake to brand as downright forgeries these products of a literary instinct that was certainly not very sincere or powerful. It is certain that letters were forged, but it is equally certain that most "pseudonymous" epistles are witnesses to a very widespread and unobjectionable literary habit.¹

6. What is the use to us of this distinction between letter and epistle, to which we have been led by the ancient letters on lead, papyrus, and earthenware?

The New Testament contains a considerable number of texts, larger or smaller, calling themselves "Letters" — "Letters" of Paul, of James, of Peter, etc. Fresh from our consideration of the ancient letters and epistles, we are at once alive to the problem: Are the "Letters" of the New Testament (and further, of early Christianity in general) non-literary letters or literary epistles? The fact that all these "letters" have been handed down by literary tradition and were first seen by all of us collected in a book, might long deceive us as to the existence of the problem. Most scholars regard all these texts unhesitatingly as works of literature. But now that the new discoveries of letters have shown the necessity of differentiation, and have given us a standard for judging whether an ancient text is letter-like in character, the problem can no longer be kept in the background. And I think the study of these ancient letters, newly discovered, obliges us to maintain that in the New Testament there are both non-literary letters and literary epistles.

The letters of Paul are not literary ; they are real letters, not epistles ; they were written by Paul not for the public and posterity, but for the persons to whom they are addressed. Almost all the mistakes that have ever been made in the study of St. Paul's life and work have arisen from neglect of the fact that his writings are non-literary and letter-like in character. His letter to the Romans, which for special inherent reasons is the least like a letter, has determined the criticism of all his other letters. But we must not begin our discussion of the question how far Paul's letters are true letters by examining the one to the Romans. We must begin with the other letters, whose nature is obvious at first sight. The more we have trained ourselves, by reading other ancient letters, to appreciate the true characteristics of a letter, the more readily shall we perceive the relationship of Paul's letters to the other non-literary texts of the period.

Paul's letter to Philemon is no doubt the one most clearly seen to be a letter. Only the colour-blindness of pedantry could possibly regard this delightful little letter as a treatise "On the attitude of Christianity to slavery." In its intercession for a runaway it is exactly parallel to the letter, quoted above, from the Papas of Hermupolis to the officer Abinnaeus. Read and interpreted as a letter this unobtrusive relic from the age of the first witnesses is one of the most valuable self-revelations that the great apostle has left us: brotherly feeling, quiet beauty, tact as of a man of the world—all these are discoverable in the letter.¹

If, as seems to me probable for substantial reasons, the 16th chapter of Romans was specially written by Paul to be sent to Ephesus, we have in it a text about which there can be no doubt that it is letter-like in character. It is easy to produce parallels from the papyrus letters, especially for the one most striking peculiarity of this letter, viz. the apparently monotonous cumulation of greetings. There is, for instance, Tasucharion's letter to her brother Nilus² (Fayûm, second century A.D.) and the letter of Ammonius to his sister Tachnumi³ (Egypt, Imperial period). Their resemblance to Romans xvi. is most striking; Paul, however, enlivens the monotony of the long list of greetings by finely discriminative personal touches. So too there is no lack of analogies for a letter of recommendation plunging at once in medias res and beginning with "I commend."⁴

In opposition to the Ephesian hypothesis it is usual to ask, How came this little letter to Ephesus to be united with the long letter to Rome as handed down to us? This question also can be answered with some probability by reference to ancient customs of letter-writing. We knew already that letter-books were in use in antiquity, containing either copies of the letters sent¹ or collections of letters received.² We now possess three interesting papyrus fragments of letter copy-books: one of the Ptolemaic period, now in the Ashmolean Museum, Oxford, with copies of letters from an official³; one of the year 104 A.D., also with official documents (two letters and one rescript), now in the British Museum⁴; and one from Hermupolis Magna, of the beginning of the second century A.D., now in the Heidelberg University Library,⁵ with copies of three letters from one Heliodorus⁶ to Eutyichides, Anubas, and Phibas, each of whom he calls "brother." These three letters are written in three parallel columns in the same hand; the upper margin contains in each case the praescript, "Heliodorus to N. N., his brother, greeting."

Now we know that St. Paul did not write his letters himself, but dictated them.⁷ The handwriting of the originals and of the letter copy-books, if such existed, will therefore have varied with the amanuensis. The little letter to Ephesus was written by a certain Tertius,¹ and the letter to Rome, being of the same date, would no doubt be written by the same Tertius and stand in his handwriting next to the Ephesian letter in the copy-book. In making a transcript from the copy-book it was the easier for the two letters in the same hand to run into one another because in the copy-book the praescripts were generally abbreviated.² And how easily might the upper margin, containing the praescript, break off! And when once the praescript was gone, the two letters would fall into one.³

The two "Epistles to the Corinthians" that have come down to us also belong to the group of real letters. What is it that makes the second Epistle so extremely unintelligible to many people? Simply the fact that it is out-and-out a letter, full of allusions which we for the most part no longer fully understand. St. Paul wrote this letter with the full strength of his personality, putting into it all the varied emotions that succeeded and encountered one another in his impulsive soul—deep contrition and thankfulness towards God, the reformer's wrath, irony and trenchant candour towards the vicious. The first "Epistle to the Corinthians" is calmer in tone because the situation of the letter is different, but this also is no pamphlet addressed to the Christian public, but a real letter to Corinth, in part an answer to a letter from the church there.

The two "Epistles to the Thessalonians" are also genuine letters, the first even more so than the second. They represent, so to say, the average type of one of Paul's letters; by which I mean that they are written with comparative composure of mind.

The "Epistle to the Galatians," on the other hand, is the offspring of passion, a fiery utterance of chastisement and defence, not at all a treatise "De lege et evangelio."

The "letters of the captivity," of which we have already mentioned that to Philemon, will perhaps gain most in meaning when treated seriously as letters. We shall come more and more, as we weigh the epistolary possibilities and probabilities of actual letter-writing, to shift the problem of their date and origin from the profitless groove into which the alternative "Rome or Caesarea" must lead; we shall try to solve it by the assumption that at least Colossians, Philemon, and the "Epistle to the Ephesians" (Laodiceans) were written during an imprisonment at Ephesus.¹ The contrast both in subject and style which has been observed between Colossians and Ephesians on the one hand and the rest of the Pauline Epistles on the other is likewise explained by the situation of those letters. Paul is writing to churches that were not yet known to him personally, and what seems epistle-like in the two letters ought really to be described as their reserved, impersonal tone. The greatest stone of offence has always been the relationship between the contents of the two texts. Now I for my part see no reason why Paul should not repeat in one "epistle" what he had already said in another; but all astonishment ceases when we observe that we have here a missionary sending letters simultaneously to two different churches that he is anxious to win. The situation is the same in both cases, and he treats practically the same questions in like manner in each letter. The difference, however, is after all so great that he asks the two churches to exchange their letters.¹ The most remarkable thing to me is the peculiar liturgical fervour of the two letters, but this is the resonance of notes that are occasionally struck in other Pauline epistles and which are not without analogies in contemporary non-Christian texts of solemn import.

The "Epistle to the Philippians," most gracious of all St. Paul's writings to the churches, is obviously letter-like. The question of where it was written stands in great need of re-examination, for statistics carefully compiled from inscriptions and papyri would show that "praetorium"² and "Caesar's household,"³ which have hitherto always been taken to indicate Rome, are not necessarily distinctive of the capital.

The Ephesian theory of St. Paul's prison writings (or some of them), suggested by a consideration of the probabilities of actual letter-writing, opens up new possibilities of accounting for the pastoral epistles, or at least some of them. The chief problem lies not in their language or the teaching contained in them, but in the circumstances under which the letters were written, the journeys that must be presupposed, and other external events in the lives of the apostle and his companions.

In the case of "Romans" one might at first be in doubt whether it were a letter or an epistle. At any rate its letter-like character is not so obvious as that of 2 Corinthians. Yet it is not an epistle addressed to all the world or even to Christendom, containing, let us say, a compendium of St. Paul's dogmatic and ethical teaching. Its mere length must not be held an argument against its letter-like character¹: there are long letters,² as well as short epistles. "Romans" is a long letter. St. Paul wishes to pave the way for his visit to the Roman Christians; that is the object of his letter. The missionary from Asia does not yet know the Western Church, and is known to it only by hearsay. The letter therefore cannot be so full of personal details as those which the apostle wrote to churches long familiar to him. "Romans" may strike many at first as being more of an epistle than a letter, but on closer examination this explains itself from the circumstances of writing. Here also, therefore, if we would understand its true significance, we must banish all thought of things literary.³ Not even the oldest codices of the New Testament, to say nothing of printed editions, give a perfectly correct idea of the spirit of this text. What was originally non-literary has there by subsequent development become literary. Early in the fourth century a Christian at Oxyrhynchus—his name was probably Aurelius Paulus—copied the beginning of Romans for some private purpose, very likely for use as an amulet, on a sheet of papyrus that is now in the Semitic Museum of Harvard University (Fig. 37).¹ The coarse, rustic, non-literary uncials in which he wrote, or got somebody to write, are more in keeping with St. Paul's letter than the book-hand of episcopally trained scribes. Those powerful lines assume once more the simple garb they probably wore in the autograph of Tertius written from Paul's dictation at Corinth.

³ Wilhelm Bousset (Theologische Literaturzeitung, 22, 1897, col. 358) says admirably: "Paul's Epistles—even that to the Romans—must be read as outpourings from the heart of an impulsive prophet-like personality, and not as dialectic didactic writings." Similarly Adolf Jülicher in the Gegenwartsbibel (Die Schriften des neuen Testaments neu übersetzt und für die Gegenwart

Taking one thing with another I have no hesitation in maintaining the thesis that all the letters of Paul are real, non-literary letters.² St. Paul was not a writer of epistles but of letters; he was not a literary man. His letters were raised to the dignity of literature afterwards, when the piety of the churches collected them, multiplied them by copying and so made them accessible to the whole of

After a long study of early Christian amulets, I now prefer the theory that the papyrus served as an amulet for the Aurelius Paulus who is named in a cursive hand beneath the text from Romans. The folds also favour this explanation.

Christendom. Later still they became sacred literature, when they were received among the books of the "New" Testament then in process of formation; and in this position their literary influence has been immeasurable. But all these subsequent experiences cannot change the original character of Paul's letters. Paul, whose yearning and ardent hope expected the Lord, and with Him the Judgment and the world to come—Paul, who reckoned the future of "this" world not by centuries and millenniums but by years, had no presentiment of the providence that watched over the fate of his letters in the world's history. He wrote with absolute abandon, more so than Augustine in his Confessions, more than the other great teachers¹ in their letters, which not infrequently are calculated for publication as well as for the immediate recipient.

This abandon constitutes the chief value of the letters of St. Paul. Their non-literary characteristics as letters are a guarantee of their reliability, their positively documentary value for the history of the apostolic period of our religion, particularly the history of St. Paul himself and his great mission. His letters are the remains (unfortunately but scanty) of the records of that mission. The task of exegesis becomes spontaneously one of psychological reproduction when once the ebb and flow of the writer's temporary moods is duly recognised. The single confessions in the letters of a nature so impulsive as St. Paul's were dashed down under the influence of a hundred various impressions, and were never calculated for systematic presentment. The strange attempt to paste them together mechanically, in the belief that thus Paulinism might be reconstructed, will have to be given up. Thus Paulinism will become more enigmatical, but Paul himself will be seen more clearly; a non-literary man of the non-literary class in the Imperial age, but prophet-like rising above his class and surveying the contemporary educated world with the consciousness of superior strength. All the traces of systematisation that are found here and there in him are proofs of the limitation of his genius; the secret of his greatness lies in religion apart from system.

There are two more real letters in the New Testament, viz. 2 and 3 John. Of the third Epistle I would say with Ulrich von Wilamowitz-Moellendorff¹: "It was entirely a private note . . . ; it must have been preserved among the papers of Gaius as a relic of the great presbyter."² The second Epistle of St. John is not so full of letter-like detail as the third, but it too has a quite definite purpose as a letter, although we cannot say with complete certainty who the lady was to whom it was addressed. That it was addressed to the whole church seems to me quite impossible. The two letters are of especial interest because they clearly betray in several instances the epistolary style of their age, and it is to be hoped that, with the aid of the papyri, we shall some day be able to determine the date of that style more exactly.

7. With the same certainty with which we describe the Pauline and two Johannine epistles as real non-literary letters, we recognise in other New Testament texts literary epistles, most clearly in the Epistles of James, Peter, and Jude,¹ which have from ancient times been known as "catholic" or "general."² A glance at the "addressees" shows that these are not real letters. Impossible demands are made of the "bearer" if we are to imagine one. A "letter," for instance, superscribed "to the twelve tribes which are scattered abroad" would be simply undeliverable. James, in whose praescript we find this "address," writes as does the author of the Epistle of Baruch "to the nine-and-a-half tribes that are in captivity." In these cases we have to do not with definite addressees but with a great "catholic" circle of readers. The authors did not despatch a single copy of their "letter," as St. Paul did of "Philippians," for example: they published a number of copies of a pamphlet.

The Epistle of James is from the beginning a little work of literature, a pamphlet addressed to the whole of Christendom, a veritable epistle. The whole of its contents agrees therewith. There is none of the unique detail peculiar to the situation, such as we have in the letters of St. Paul, but simply general questions, most of them still conceivable under the present conditions of our church life. But the Epistle of James is nevertheless a product of popular literature. The Epistles of Peter and of Jude have also quite unreal addresses; the letter-like touches are purely decorative. Here we have the beginnings of a Christian literature; the Epistles of Jude and Peter, though still possessing as a whole many popular

The question of the "authenticity" of all these epistles is, from our point of view, not nearly so important as it would certainly be if they were real letters. The personality of the authors recedes almost entirely into the background. A great cause is speaking to us, not a clearly definable personality, such as we see in the letters of St. Paul, and it is of little importance to the understanding of the text whether we know the names of the writers with certainty or not. From our knowledge of the literary habits of antiquity, as well as on general historical grounds, we are bound to regard the catholic epistles first and foremost as epistles issued under a protecting name, and may therefore call them, in the good sense of the word, heteronymous.

It is very noteworthy in this connexion that the longest "epistle" in the New Testament, the so-called Epistle to the Hebrews, is altogether anonymous, as it has come down to us. Even the "address" has vanished. Were it not for some details in xiii. 22-24 that sound letter-like, one would never suppose that the work was meant to be an epistle, not to mention a letter. It might equally well be an oration or a diatribe; it calls itself a "word of exhortation" (xiii. 22). It is clear from this example how in epistles all that seems letter-like is mere ornament; if any of the ornament crumbles off the character of the whole thing is not essentially altered. Failure to recognise the literary character of the Epistle to the Hebrews has led to a large number of superfluous hypotheses about the "addressees," etc.,¹ and the fact has been overlooked that the Epistle gains immensely in importance if really considered as literature: it is historically the earliest example of Christian artistic literature. What had been shyly attempted in some other epistles has here been more fully carried out. Alike in form and contents this epistle strives to rise from the stratum in which Christianity had its origin towards the higher level of learning and culture.

The so-called "First Epistle of St. John" has none of the specific characters of an epistle, and is, of course, even less like a letter. The little work has got along with the epistles, but it is best described as a religious diatribe, in which Christian meditations are loosely strung together for the benefit of the community of the faithful.

The "Apocalypse of John," however, is strictly speaking an epistle: it has in i. 4 an epistolary praescript with a religious wish, and in xxii. 21 a conclusion suitable for an epistle. The epistle is again subdivided at the beginning into seven small portions addressed to the churches of Asia—Ephesus, Smyrna, Pergamum, Thyatira, Sardis, Philadelphia, Laodicea. These again are not real letters, sent separately to the respective churches and afterwards collected together. All seven of them, rather, have been written with an eye to the whole, and are to be read and taken to heart by all the churches, not only by the one named in the address. They represent, however, in my opinion, a more letter-like species of epistle than those we have been considering hitherto. The writer wishes to achieve certain ends with the single churches, but at the same time to influence of the "Forschungen," edited by W. Bousset and H. Gunkel), Göttingen, 1906 Wrede agrees with my view. As he very well puts it (p. 73), "The main point in the end is to recognise the whole epistle as a literary work."

the whole body of Christians, or at any rate Asiatic Christians. In spite, therefore, of their familiar form his missives have a public and literary purpose, and hence they are more correctly ranged with the early Christian epistles than with the letters. They belong moreover to a large species of religious epistolography, which still plays an important part in the popular religion of the present day,¹ viz. the "letters from heaven."²

8. Having clearly worked out the difference between the non-literary letter and the literary epistle, we are now able to attempt a sketch of the literary development of Primitive Christianity. If in doing so we speak of times or periods, we do not mean to imply that sharp chronological divisions are possible.

Christianity, then, does not begin as a literary movement. Its creative period is non-literary.

Jesus of Nazareth is altogether unliterary. He never wrote³ or dictated a line. He depended entirely on the living word, full of a great confidence that the scattered seed would spring up. Always speaking face to face with His friends, never separated from them by the ocean, He had no need to write letters. In His remote country home He wanders from village to village and from one little town to another, preaching in a boat or in synagogues or on a sunlit hill, but never do we find Him in the shade of the writing-room. Excelling them of old time in reverence as in all things else, He would not have ventured to take the prophet's pen and add new "Scriptures" to the old, for the new thing for which He looked came not in book, formulae, and subtle doctrine, but in spirit and in fire.

Side by side with Jesus there stands, equally non-literary, His apostle. Even from the hand of St. Paul we should possess not a line, probably, if he had remained, like his Master, in retirement. But the spirit drove the cosmopolite back into the diaspora. The great world-centres on the roads and on the coasts become homes of the gospel, and if the artisan-missionary at Ephesus wishes to talk to the foolish Galatians or the poor brethren at Corinth, then in the midst of the hurry and worry of pressing daily duties he dictates a letter, adding at the end a few lines roughly written with his own hard and weary weaver's hand. These were no books or pamphlets for the world or even for Christendom; they were confidential pronouncements, of whose existence and contents the missionary's nearest companions often knew nothing: Luke even writes his Acts of the Apostles without knowledge of the letters of St. Paul (which were written but not yet published). But the lack of all publicist intention, the complete absence of literary pose, the contempt of the stylist's sounding phrase,—this it was that predestined St. Paul's unbookish lines, so unassuming and yet written with such powerful originality, to literary fortunes of truly world-wide import to history. They were to become a centre of energy for the future, influencing leading men and books and civilisations down to the present day.

Such sayings of the non-literary Jesus as have been reported to us by others, and such non-literary letters as remain to us of St. Paul's, show us that Christianity in its earliest creative period was most closely bound up with the lower classes¹ and had as yet no effective connexion with the small upper class possessed of power and culture. Jesus is more in company with the small peasants and townsmen of a rural civilisation—the people of the great city have rejected Him; St. Paul goes rather with the citizens and artisans of the great international cities²; but both Jesus and St. Paul are full of magnificent irony and lofty contempt where the upper classes are concerned. But the conventional language of rural civilisations is always the simpler, and therefore the popular standard and popular elements are seen much more clearly in Jesus than in St. Paul. Paul's letters, however, are also popular in tone. This is most conspicuous in his vocabulary, but even the subject-matter is adapted to the problems, difficulties, and weaknesses of humble individuals. Only, of course, a man of St. Paul's greatness has knowledge beyond the thousand-word vocabulary of (say) a mere loafer at the docks, leading a vegetable existence, and with no religion except a belief in daemons. St. Paul has a poet's mastery of language, he experiences with unabated force in the depths of his prophet-soul the subtlest, tenderest emotions known in the sphere of religion and morals, and he reveals his experience in the personal confessions contained in his letters.

¹ One of the worst blunders ever made by criticism was to explain the particularly clear tokens of this connexion as later Ebionite interpolations. But even if we surrendered to these critics all that Jesus says about mammon, we shall still, for linguistic and other reasons, be bound to maintain our thesis.

The creative, non-literary period is followed by the conservative, literary period, but this receives its immediate stamp from the motive forces of the former epoch. The earliest Christian literature is of a popular kind, not artistic literature¹ for the cultured.² It either creates a simple form for itself (the gospel), or it employs the most artless forms assumed by Jewish or pagan prose (the chronicle, apocalypse, epistle, diatribe). The popular features exhibited are of two kinds, corresponding to the characteristic difference that struck us when comparing Jesus and St. Paul: we have on the one hand the influence of the country and provincial towns, on the other hand that of the great towns predominating.³

The synoptic gospels, themselves based on earlier little books, exhibit the local colour of the Galilean and Palestinian countryside; the great city, in which the catastrophe occurs, stands in frightful contrast to all the rest. The Epistle of St. James will be best understood in the open air beside the piled sheaves of a harvest field; it is the first powerful echo of the still recent synoptic gospel-books.

St. Luke dedicates his books to a man of polish, but this does not make them polite literature. Here and there the language of his gospel, and more especially the style and subject-matter of his book of apostolic history, mark the transition to the popular books in which the cosmopolite tone prevails. To this latter class belong, so it seems to me, the Epistle of Jude, the Epistles of Peter, and the book of the seven cities (Revelation of St. John). This last is particularly popular in character, written with the passionate earnestness of a prophet who speaks the popular language of his time, and is familiar with the images created by the popular imagination of the East.¹

² Cf. Georg Heinrici in "Theologische Abhandlungen Carl von Weizsäcker . . . gewidmet," Freiburg i. B., 1892, p. 329: "The New Testament writings are distinguished by a far-reaching neglect of the laws that were recognised throughout the classical world as governing artistic representation."

³ I hope nobody will suppose that I intend to hint at any difference of value between these two classes.

The Gospel of St. John, in spite of the Logos in the opening lines,² is altogether popular, and so is the diatribe which goes under the name of the First Epistle of St. John. These Johannine texts are still most decidedly popular works, but they are neither decidedly rural nor decidedly urban; rural and urban, synoptic and Pauline are united together into what I should call intercultural Christian characteristics.

After this the production of popular Christian literature never ceased. It runs through the centuries. Often it went on as it were subterranously, in holes and corners, in secret conventicles—from the earliest known texts of vulgar Latin, the Muratorian Canon, and the swarm of late gospels, “acts,” and “revelations” which are branded as apocryphal, to the books of martyrdoms, legends of saints, and pilgrimages,—from the printed postils, consolatories, and tractates down to the vast modern polyglot of missionary and edifying literature. Even to-day the greatest part of this popular literature perishes after serving its purpose. The dullest book of professional hypothesis in theology, which nobody ever will read, finds a place in our libraries, but books of prayer that served whole generations for edification become literary rarities after a hundred years. Thus of the whole vast mass of Christian popular literature of all times only a scanty remnant has come down to us, and even this is almost stifled by the volume of learned theological literature, which has pushed itself, bulky and noisy, into the foreground.

If we trace this technical literature of theology back to its beginnings we come to the Epistle to the Hebrews, a work which seems to hang in the background like an intruder among the New Testament company of popular books. It marks an epoch in the literary development of Christianity inasmuch as it is the first tolerably clear example of a literature which still, like the older popular writings, appealed only to Christians and not to the whole world, but was consciously dictated by theological interests, and dominated (quite unlike the letters of Paul) by theological methods and the endeavour to attain beauty of form. Christianity has moved from its native stratum and is seeking to acquire culture.

It was but a step from this artistic literature for Christians to artistic literature for the world, such as the apologists of the second century produced. The subsequent lines of this development are well known.

But before Christian literature ventured on this great step into the world, the pristine inheritance was separated off from the books of the after-generation by the insurmountable barrier of a new canon. The formation of the New Testament is the most important event in the literary history of mankind: wherein lay its significance, merely as regards literature? It meant, in the first place, the preservation of the relics of the past age. Secondly, that the non-literary part of these relics was raised to the rank of literature, and the impulse given to unite all the parts gradually into a single book. Finally, that texts older than "the church" were elevated to standards for the church, and popular texts became a book for the world.¹ The fact that scarcely any but popular and primitive Christian writings found their way into the nascent New Testament is a brilliant proof of the unerring tact of the Church that formed the Canon.

9. We have reached the end of a chapter, and if any one should object that its results could all have been obtained without the aid of the inscriptions, papyri, and ostraca, it is not for me to enter an indignant denial. Speaking for myself, however, I am bound to say that I had never grasped those main lines of the literary development of Christianity until I took up the study of the class of document we have been considering. Then it was that the great difference between literary and non-literary writing impressed itself on me, and I learnt from the papyrus letters to appreciate the characteristics of the non-literary letter.

From that time onward the literary history of Primitive Christianity stood out before me in all its grandeur.

It began without any written book at all. There was only the living word,—the gospel, but no gospels. Instead of the letter there was the spirit. The beginning, in fact, was Jesus Himself. This age of the spirit had not passed away before the apostle Paul was at work. He wrote his letters not to gain the ear of literary men, but to keep up confidential intercourse with those dear to him.

Next there sprang up among the Christian brotherhoods popular books with no pretensions to literary art. Yet these were the beginnings of Christian literature, and the authors—evangelists, prophets, apostles—being themselves men of the people, spoke and wrote the people's language.

The Epistle to the Hebrews shows us Christianity preparing for a flight from its native levels into the higher region of culture, and we are conscious of the beginnings of a Christian world-literature. First, however, the new religion, reviewing its own initial stages, begins to collect the relics of that early period as a standard for the future.

The development of the literature is a reflex of the whole early history of Christianity. We watch the stages of growth from brotherhoods to church, from the unlearned to theologians, from the lower and middle classes to the upper world. It is one long process of cooling and hardening. If we still persist in falling back upon the New Testament after all these centuries, we do so in order to make the hardened metal fluid once more. The New Testament was edited and handed down by the Church, but there is none of the rigidity of the law about it, because the texts composing it are documents of a period antecedent to the Church, when our religion was still sustained by inspiration. The New Testament is a book, but not of your dry kind, for the texts composing it are still to-day, despite the tortures to which literary criticism has subjected them, living confessions of Christian inwardness. And if, owing to its Greek idiom, the New Testament cannot dispense with learned interpreters, it is by no means an exclusive book for the few. The texts composing it come from the souls of saints sprung from the people, and therefore the New Testament is the Bible for the many.

CHAPTER IV

SOCIAL AND RELIGIOUS HISTORY IN THE NEW TESTAMENT, ILLUSTRATED FROM THE NEW TEXTS

1. IN the days before the ancient inscriptions had sunk beneath the soil, when men still wrote on papyrus and potsherd, and the coins of the Roman Caesars were in daily circulation, Jesus of Galilee called for a silver denarius of Rome when He was disputing with His adversaries, and said, referring to the image and superscription on the coin, "Render unto Caesar the things that are Caesar's; and unto God the things that are God's."¹ It was an age in which the Caesar was honoured as a god; Jesus showed no disrespect towards Caesar, but by distinguishing so sharply between Caesar and God He made a tacit protest against the worship of the emperor. That pregnant sentence does not present us with two equal magnitudes, Caesar and God: the second is clearly the superior of the first; the sense is, "Render unto Caesar the things that are Caesar's; and, a fortiori, unto God the things that are God's."² The portrait and legend were an ocular demonstration of the right of the sovereign who coined the money to demand tribute from the provincials. The claims of God were in no sense affected, for they are high as the heavens above this world's claims. Thus Jesus made use of the portrait and legend on a Roman coin to give a concrete, tangible answer to a question of the day involving religion and politics.

Some time later, on the eve of His martyrdom, in the trusted circle of His immediate disciples, Jesus referred to a secular custom, examples of which are derivable from literature¹ and most abundantly from inscriptions and coins of Greek-speaking lands—the custom of distinguishing princes and other eminent men with the honourable title of Euergetes, “benefactor.”² It would not be difficult to collect from inscriptions, with very little loss of time, over a hundred instances, so widespread was the custom. I give here one example only, of the same period as the evangelists. Gaius Stertinius Xenophon, body-physician to the Emperor Claudius, whom he afterwards poisoned, was contemporary with Jesus, and received from the people of Cos, probably about A.D. 53, in gratitude for his valuable services to his native island, the title of “Benefactor.” The title precedes his name, for instance, in a fragmentary inscription from Cos³ (Figure 38), which was probably connected with some honour conferred on his wife:⁴

Jesus knew this custom of "the Gentiles" most probably from Syrian and Phoenician coins¹ which circulated in Palestine, and it is, I think, justifiable to suppose that this common Greek title existed as a borrowed word in Aramaic. The Greek title in the mouth of Jesus is, like His words about the denarius, one of the instances in which we seem to hear in the language of the Master the roar of breakers coming from the great world afar off. He mentioned the title not without contempt, and forbade His disciples to allow themselves to be so called: the name contradicted the idea of service in brotherhood.

About twenty years after this St. Paul, on his journeyings through the world, finds himself at Athens. He walks through the streets, and stands meditating before an altar. He is profoundly interested by the inscription²: "To the unknown god." That line on the stone is to him the embodiment of the pagan yearning for the living God, whom he possesses in Christ.

At Ephesus, whither St. Paul soon proceeded, there was another experience, not with an inscription this time, but with papyrus books. Preaching with the Holy Ghost and with power he won over a number of Jews and pagans, and many of them who had dealt in magic brought their magical books and burnt them publicly. There were such quantities of them that St. Luke—perhaps with some pious exaggeration—places their value at 50,000 silver drachmae.³ The new discoveries enable us to form a peculiarly vivid conception of the appearance and contents of these magical books. There are in our museums numerous fragments of ancient papyrus books of magic, sometimes of very considerable size, for the publication and elucidation of which we are especially indebted to Carl Wessely, Albrecht Dieterich, and Frederic Kenyon. The largest fragment is no doubt the "Great" Magical Papyrus in the Bibliothèque Nationale at Paris,¹ which was written about 300 A.D., and has been edited by Wessely.² Though it was not written till some centuries after St. Paul's adventure, though it is in the form of a codex (instead of the roll which was probably still usual in the time of St. Paul), and though the usurpation of the name of Jesus (among other things) makes it no longer purely pagan or Jewish, yet it will in the main afford us magical texts that are considerably older than the MS., and we are in a position to construct from it a distinct picture of what ancient magical literature at the time of St. Paul was like. There can, I think, be no doubt that we must assume a strong strain of Jewish influence in it even then. I choose as a specimen leaf 33 of the Paris book³ containing the end of a

RECTO, PAGAN TEXT

The subject referred to is a root, which is dug up with certain ceremonies, while a magic spell is pronounced, part of which comes on this page. The daemon is being addressed. Note the paratactic style and the frequent use of and.⁷

 Hermes. Thy trees are the bones of Mnevis.⁸ And thy

¹ ἔκτρομος is not in the lexicons, but it seems to be a synonym of ἐντρομος, Acts vii. 32, xvi. 29; Heb. xii. 21. (TR.)

⁴ For ᾦν after ἐάν cf. Neue Bibelstudien, pp. 29, 31; Bible Studies, p. 201 f.

⁶ The MS. has αφαιρων, but ἀφαιρῶν would make no sense. ἀπαίρων, however, used as in LXX Psalm lxxvii. [lxxviii.] 26, 52 in the sense of “make to go forth,” suits admirably and was probably the original reading.

⁸ The Egyptian Sun-bull.

⁹ Here, I think, one line or more must have dropped out; even by taking ὡς as a preposition we get no good sense.

RECTO, JEWISH TEXT

For those possessed by daemons, an approved charm by Pibechis⁶.

Take oil made from unripe olives, together with the plant mastigia⁷ and lotus pith,⁸ and boil it with marjoram

⁸ Lotometra is perhaps the name of a plant, cf. Thesaurus Linguae Graecae, V. col. 473.

⁹ In these charms we should try to distinguish between meaningless hocus-pocus and words of Semitic (cf. Bibelstudien, p. 1 ff.; Bible Studies, p. 321 ff.) or Egyptian origin, etc., which once had and might still have a meaning. In trying to recover this meaning we must not only employ the resources of modern philology but also take into account the ancient popular and guessing etymologies, of which we have a good number of (Semitic) examples in the Onomastica Sacra. Several of the magical words in this text are Biblical and are explained in the Onomastica Sacra. That the explanations in the Onomastica Sacra were in some cases current among the people, is shown by the Heidelberg papyrus amulet containing Semitic names and Greek explanations (cf. Figure 62, facing p. 415 below).

⁷ ? Dieterich, Abraxas, p. 138, alters it to τανυσθεῖς.

⁸ Cf. Tanchuma, Pikkudē 3: Rabbi Jochanan said: ". . . Know that all the souls which have been since the first Adam and which shall be till the end of the whole world, were created in the six days of creation. They are all in the garden of Eden" (Ferdinand Weber, Jüdische Theologie auf Grund des Talmud und verwandter Schriften,² Leipzig, 1897, p. 225).

 bringer,¹³ invincible,¹⁴ who knoweth what is in the heart

³ A frequent expression in the LXX.

⁷ LXX Exod. vii. 4.

¹³ Cf. LXX Gen. i. 3 and many similar passages.

⁷ LXX Joshua iii. 13 ff.; Psalm cxiii. [cxiv.] 3.

⁸ LXX Exod. xiv.

⁹ LXX Exod. xiv. 27.

¹⁰ Noah's generations enumerated in Genesis x. contain the names of 70 peoples; the Jews therefore assumed that there were 70 different languages (Weber,² p. 66). Our papyrus has 2 × 70 languages—a number not mentioned elsewhere, so far as I know.

¹¹ Cf. LXX Psalm cxxviii. [cxxxix.] 4.

¹³ LXX Psalm xviii. [xix.] 2.

¹⁵ Mountains (ὄρη) is a corruption of bounds (ὄρια), cf. LXX Job xxxviii. 10, and especially LXX Jer. v. 22.

- a wall of sand,¹ and hath charged it not to pass over,² and the deep hearkened. And do thou 3065 hearken, every daemonic spirit, for I adjure thee by him that moveth³ the four winds since the holy aeons, him the heaven-like, sea-like, cloud-like, the light-bringer, invincible. I adjure thee by him that is in Jerosolymum⁴ the pure, to whom the 3070 unquenchable fire⁵ through every aeon is offered, through his holy name Jaeō-baphrenemun (Sentence), before whom trembleth⁶ the Genna⁷ of fire and flames flame round about⁸ and iron bursteth⁹ and every mountain feareth¹⁰ from its foundations.
 3075 I adjure thee, every daemonic spirit, by him that looketh down on earth and maketh tremble the foundations¹¹ thereof and hath made all things out of things which are not into Being.¹² But I adjure thee, thou that usest¹³ this adjuration: the flesh of swine

³ LXX Psalm cxxiv. [cxxxv.] 7.

⁴ Cf. LXX Psalm cxxxiv. [cxxxv.] 21. The form of the name of the city again points to a pagan writer.

⁶ LXX Isaiah xiv. 9.

⁸ LXX Isaiah lxvi. 15 ff., etc.

¹⁰ LXX Psalm xvii. [xviii.] 8, etc.; cf. also Bibelstudien, p. 45 f.; Bible Studies, p. 290 f.

¹³ Or "receivest." (Tr.)

- 3080 eat not, and there shall be subject unto thee every spirit and daemon, whatsoever he be. But when thou adjurest, blow,¹ sending the breath from above [to the feet] and from the feet to the face,² and he [the daemon] will be drawn into captivity. Be pure and keep it. For the sentence
- 3085 is Hebrew and kept by men that are pure.³

Good parallels to the Jewish portion of the above text, both as a whole and in details, are furnished by the leaden tablet from Hadrumentum⁴ and a magician's outfit discovered at Pergamum.⁵ Any one who can read this one leaf without getting bewildered by the hocus-pocus of magic words, will admit that through the curious channel of such magical literature a good portion of the religious thought of the Greek Old Testament found its way into the world, and must have already found its way by the time of St. Paul. The men of the great city in Asia Minor in whose hands St. Paul found texts of this kind were, though heathen, not altogether unprepared for Bible things. The flames of the burning papyrus books could not destroy recollections of sacred formulae which retained a locus standi even in the new faith. But, apart from this, the magical books with their grotesque farrago of Eastern and Western religious formulae, afford us striking illustrations of how the religions were elbowing one another as the great turning-point drew near. They are perhaps

Jesus handling coins, St. Paul reading the inscription on the Athenian altar, or watching the burning of magical books at Ephesus—are not these detached pictures typical? Is not the New Testament itself offering us a clue in our studies? Is it not telling us that the texts contemporary with but not belonging to Primitive Christianity, which have come down to us in the original, must be read with the eyes of the religious man and with the spectacles of the historian of religion? This raises the subject of the present chapter: the bearing of the new texts on social¹ and religious² history. In the second chapter we discussed the linguistic, in the third the literary bearing of the new texts on the New Testament, and we were chiefly, of course, concerned with the more formal aspects of interpretation. Now we are proposing an inquiry which involves deeper issues. We seek to understand the substance of the New Testament (and so of Primitive Christianity), and

² The comparative study of religion, so it seems to me, has of late led to an exaggeration of the so-called Oriental "influences" (Hermann Gunkel, Zum religionsgeschichtlichen Verständnis des Neuen Testaments, Göttingen, 1903). The material must be more sharply discriminated as "analogical" and "genealogical," and the genealogical portion is in the main only of indirect importance (this is also the opinion of Gunkel, who assumes that Judaism acted as intermediary). Gunkel, however (p. 6), rightly emphasises the fact that the New Testament is a Greek book. This is the side of the problem which interests me most. My desire is to continue the work recently begun by Georg Heinrici, Adolf Harnack, H. J. Holtzmann, Otto Pfeiderer, and other theologians, by Hermann Usener, Albrecht Dieterich, Richard Reitzenstein, Paul Wendland, and other classical scholars. To the literary Greek sources, which have been chiefly studied hitherto, I would add the non-literary ones, which are for the most part more congenial with the New Testament. An excellent guide to the material hitherto collected by students of comparative religion is Carl Clemen's Religionsgeschichtliche Erklärung des Neuen Testaments, Giessen, 1909.

here again, I believe, the new texts will not desert us.

Some kind of an understanding as to methods of work would certainly be desirable at the outset ; but I must resist the temptation to discuss here in its full extent a methodological problem¹ which has engaged my liveliest interest since the beginning of my studies. I will only remark that in the case of each single observation made I find the questions resolve themselves for me into the alternative² : is it analogy or is it genealogy ? That is to say, we have to ask : Are the similarities or points of agreement that we discover between two different religions to be regarded as parallelisms of more or less equal religious experience, due to equality of psychic pitch and equality of outward conditions, or are they dependent one on the other, demonstrable borrowings ?

Where it is a case of inward emotions and religious experiences and the naïve expression of these emotions and experiences in word, symbol, and act, I should always try first to regard the particular fact as "analogical."³

Where it is a case of a formula used in worship, a professional liturgical usage, or the formulation of some doctrine, I should always try first to regard the particular fact as "genealogical."

The apologist, if he ever acknowledges anything, acknowledges as a rule only analogy, and prefers to erect walls and fences round his own little precinct.

The amateur in these subjects thinks as a rule only of genealogy. His best instrument is the wooden ruler with which, to his own increasing admiration, he draws straight lines that can be produced to any length. Finding a phantom of the desert among the Bedouins and a slave possessed with a daemon in the lanes of Smyrna, he triumphantly proclaims the phantom as the ancestress of the daemon, and there is nothing hidden from his sagacity after he has persuaded himself that the gold in some prehistoric shrine came from Saba, the marble from Paros, and the cedar-wood from Lebanon.

Most pitiable of all, however, are the mere shifters-on¹ and wipers-out of names. Anything trivial they regard as genuine; where there is a great name, there is something to rub out: the Sermon on the Mount cannot be by Jesus, nor the Second to Corinthians by Paul. By whom then? The Sermon on the Mount by X or Y, or possibly by seventeen anonymous writers, and the Second to Corinthians, if written by anybody, then by Z, yes, by Z! Having thus made everything anonymous, they think they have done a work of scholarship and have disposed of the texts themselves for ever.

Now, supposing there were cogent reasons for doubting St. Paul's authorship of the confessions in the Second to Corinthians, I should acknowledge these reasons. But would the text itself be then done away with? The text itself, with its thoughts, remains, and remains classic: the disappearance of the one word Paul from the first line does not detract from the intrinsic value of the text. Does a coin-collector throw one of his gold coins on the dust-heap because it was along with the Persian ones and he finds it to be Lycian, or because he is unable to identify it at all?

What is the actual result of making the synoptic sayings of Jesus anonymous? Merely the proper name Jesus is erased; the centre of energy, the "I," the personality behind the sayings, remains.

We will not dispute that the erasers and shifters-on may in their zeal empty an ink-pot over the map of the ancient Mediterranean lands; a great deal is possible in the scholar's study. But if these poor people want us to do more than sympathise with them in their misfortune—as we certainly do most readily—if they ask us to believe that the blackened provinces of their dirty map have swallowed up all that was counted valuable evidence of the ancient culture of the Mediterranean, they demand the sacrifice of our intellects. We must treat them kindly, and let them go on shifting; the earth is round, and so, across sea and land, they will find their way back to us some day.

Pledged to no inexorable "method," but testing each case as it arises; not providing an answer at any cost to every question, but content to leave doubtful what is really obscure; recognising, however, that light is light—the New Testament student will reap a rich harvest from our texts. Let me proceed to give some indication of the sort of thing he is likely to find, and where it may be found.¹

2. He finds the world as it was in the age of the Caesars, that is the historical background of Primitive Christianity—and first of all the general cultural background.

In sketching the literary development of Primitive Christianity we saw that in the growth of our religion there is reflected from the very beginning the difference between the characteristics of the common people in town and country. To comprehend this difference we must know what the ancient civilisation was like in town and country. From literary sources we were fairly well acquainted with ancient city-life, but the ancient village and small country town, being seldom touched upon in literature, were practically inaccessible. Archaeological discovery, especially since the finding of papyri and ostraca, has brought about a resurrection of such places. As students of the New Testament we are most interested in the villages and little country towns of Galilee, and we have at any rate become acquainted with the same kind of places in the neighbour land of Egypt.

Some idea of the abundance and freshness of the materials now at our command to illustrate the civilisation of certain Egyptian villages may be gathered from an examination of Wessely's¹ valuable collections relating to the villages of Caranis and Socnopaei Nesos. Any one who has been brought up in the country and has a spark of imagination clinging to him can now without difficulty participate by sympathy in the thousand and one little things that made up the social vortex for the men and women of these places. The same trifles, of daily occurrence among their not very dissimilar neighbours in Galilee at the same epoch, served the Master of parable as symbols of the Eternal.

No less vividly, however, the country towns of Egypt, large and small, arise before us—Arsinoë, Magdola, Oxyrhynchus,¹ Hermupolis,² and other places.

There must, of course, have been differences between country life in Egypt and in Palestine, owing particularly to differences in the soil and methods of work. The degree of Hellenisation must also have been slighter in Galilee than in Egypt. But the common element must have predominated.

The parallelism extends not only to details of social history such as the unpopularity of the “publicans,”³ or again the “tribute” of two drachmae⁴ levied in Egypt for the Great Great God Suchus in the gospel age,⁵ but also to peculiarities of legal life.

[p. 267]

“And so Pilate, willing to content the people, released Barabbas unto them, and delivered Jesus, when he had scourged Him, to be crucified.”

The papyrus, containing a report of judicial proceedings, quotes these words of the governor of Egypt, G. Septimius Vegetus, before whom the case was tried, to a certain Phibion:—

“Thou hadst been worthy of scourging¹ . . . but I will give thee to the people.”²

Phibion's offence was that he had “of his own authority imprisoned a worthy man [his alleged debtor] and also women.” The Florentine papyrus is thus a beautiful illustration of the parable of the wicked servant (Matt. xviii. 30) and the system, which it presupposes, of personal execution by imprisonment for debt. Numerous other papyri and inscriptions show that this was in Graeco-Roman Egypt, and elsewhere, a widespread legal custom.³ Probably the most interesting example for us is an inscription⁴ in the Great Oasis containing an edict of the governor of Egypt, Tib. Julius Alexander, 68 A.D. The technical expression here used has the same ring as in the gospel. “They delivered them into other prisons,” says the Roman governor⁵; “he cast him into prison,” says Jesus.⁶

Perhaps the most remarkable discovery of this kind in the new texts is a parallel found some time ago to the statement in Luke ii. 3, which has been so much questioned on the strength of mere book-learning, that on the occasion of the enrolment for taxation made by Cyrenius, "all went to enrol themselves, every one to his own city."¹ That this was no mere figment of St. Luke or his authority, but that similar things² took place in that age, is proved by an edict³ of G. Vibius Maximus, governor of Egypt, 104 A.D. (Figure 42). I am indebted to Ulrich Wilcken⁴ for the following restoration of the text, to which re-examinations of the original by Grenfell and Hunt have also contributed:—

who for any cause soever are outside their homes to return to their domestic hearths, that they may also accomplish the customary dispensation of enrolment and continue steadfastly in the husbandry that belongeth to them.

With regard to the last two lines Wilcken¹ writes to me: "We have several such edicts, requiring the peasants to return and do their work (*e.g.*² Geneva Papyrus No. 16). The Praefect here goes beyond his immediate subject when he takes the opportunity to enforce these injunctions once again."

The cultural parallelism between Egypt and the birthplace of Christianity again explains the fact that we are repeatedly able to illustrate from Egyptian papyri details of the life of the people in Palestine which Jesus immortalised in His parables.

Besides the above-mentioned parallel to the parable of the wicked servant, we have illustrations to the parables of the good Samaritan,³ the importunate widow,⁴ and the prodigal son.⁵ To one familiar with both the gospels and the papyri the general impression says even more plainly than the details that we are dealing with the same kind of people in the two countries.

Of course there are equally notable parallels to gospel details in the written remains found in other Mediterranean lands. The fact is that the threads of connexion between Primitive Christianity and the world are to be sought not in the high regions of culture and power but in the lower levels of the common life of the people, which has been far too much neglected hitherto. When it has once been grasped that the threads cross and re-cross where labourers work for hire in the vineyard, and where the house is swept for the sake of a lost drachma, we shall be ready to receive with something more than indifference a detail like the following, which brings so vividly before our eyes the popular character of the gospel.¹

In order to arm His disciples for their dangerous work in the world with the same trust in God that filled His own heart, Jesus exhorts them (Matt. x. 28 ff.) thus :—

“Fear not. . . . Are not two sparrows sold for a farthing? and one of them shall not fall on the ground without your Father. But the very hairs of your head are all numbered. Fear ye not therefore; ye are of more value than many sparrows.”

The evangelist Luke (xii. 6) has recorded this saying somewhat differently :—

The difference between these two versions is practically quite unimportant, although the equation $2 : 5 = 1 : 2$ does not hold mathematically. On the purchaser taking a larger number of birds the proportional price may well have been reduced; as we should say nowadays, they came cheaper by the half-dozen. It is quite possible that Jesus repeated this particularly homely analogical conclusion from the less (the little sparrows) to the greater (the infinitely more valuable human beings) on more than one occasion, with variants, so that both versions might go back to Him. Be that as it may, the saying about the sparrows—apart, of course, from the mighty “Fear not,” which is indivisible—contains a threefold statement if we analyse it as an economic document of the Imperial period :—

- (1) Sparrows were a very cheap article sold in the market as food for the poor ;
- (2) They were sold in the market either by the pair or in fives, the pair being the smallest, and five the next smallest quantity sold ;
- (3) The market price in the time of Jesus was a “farthing” (= about a halfpenny of our money) a pair, or two “farthings” (= about a penny of our money) for five.

The same three deductions, nearly, can be drawn from one of the inscriptions discovered recently. There is a highly important commercial law of the Emperor Diocletian, known as the maximum tariff, the greater part of which has long been known from inscriptions. All kinds of articles of commerce are quoted in this tariff, and to each item is attached the highest price at which it is allowed to be sold. Historians of the Imperial period are not agreed as to the real purpose of this tariff ; but the question does not concern us here. The interesting point for us is that a new fragment¹ of the tariff which was discovered in Aegira in 1899 gives us the highest price for sparrows. From it we learn the following particulars, applying of course to the end of the third century A.D. :—

- (1) Of all birds used for food sparrows are the cheapest ; they are cheaper, for instance, than thrushes, beccaficoes, and starlings.

- (2) They were usually sold in decades. Ten seems to have been the regular number with all sorts of small animals (cf. our dozen); the tariff, for instance, gives the prices for 10 thrushes, 10 beccaficoes, 10 starlings.
- (3) According to the tariff 10 sparrows are to be sold for at most 16 "denarii." This does not mean the old silver denarii, but the new copper coins, whose value Theodor Mommsen¹ and Salomon Reinach² agree in estimating at ($1\frac{4}{5}$ pfennig, $2\frac{1}{4}$ centimes) less than an English farthing. The market price of 10 sparrows was fixed at a maximum of threepence-halfpenny (English).

From what Jesus says, the half-decade of sparrows in His day cost about one penny (English); the whole decade would therefore cost about twopence. Taking into account the difference in date—which is itself quite sufficient to explain the difference in price—and the fact that Diocletian is fixing a maximum price, we cannot deny that Jesus spoke with correct observation of the conditions of everyday life. This is not a mere game that we have been playing with farthings. The edict of the Emperor Diocletian helps us, I think, to understand one of the finest utterances of Jesus in its original significance. Even in small things Jesus is great. The unerring eye for actualities that asserts itself so repeatedly in the gospel parables, comes out also in the saying about the sparrows. St. Paul has been accused—but unjustly—of overreaching himself in the figure (Rom. xi. 17 ff.) of the wild branch grafted on the cultivated olive. The reproach is groundless, because St. Paul is there bent on demonstrating something that is really against nature; but St. Paul, the inhabitant of the city, had not the grand simplicity of Jesus, the child of the country, in his attitude to nature, or he would never have written (1 Cor. ix. 9), with expectation of a negative answer, "Doth God take care for oxen?" Jesus grew up among country people, who lived with their animals and felt for them: the ox and the ass, as we know from pictures in the catacombs, were early placed beside the manger-cradle of the child Christ, and the popular instinct that borrowed them from Isaiah i. 3, and still speaks to us from those pictures, was right. Jesus was in His true element in the market-place, watching a poor woman counting her coppers to see if she could still take five or ten sparrows home with her. Poor, miserable little creatures, fluttering there, such numbers of them, in the vendors' cages! A great many can be had for a very small sum, so trifling is their value. And yet each one of them was loved by the Heavenly Father. How much more will God care for man, whose soul is worth more than the whole world!

While the papyri from the villages and small towns of Egypt introduce us indirectly to the characteristic civilisation of the synoptic gospels, the rediscovered culture of the cities of Asia Minor, Greece, and Southern Italy shows us rather the background of St. Paul's missionary labours.

Even Pompeii, although St. Paul probably never walked its lanes, is extraordinarily instructive. It not only furnishes us with texts; it has, by its peculiar fate, been itself preserved with all the actuality of petrification, and we may regard it as a typical town. "Such was the actual appearance of a city of Campania at the time when the Emperors Nero, Vespasian, Titus ruled the world of their day." This remark about Pompeii was made by Friedrich von Duhn,¹ under whose masterly guidance I was privileged to visit the place, gathering new and lasting impressions; and I would add, speaking in terms of the New Testament: Such was the appearance of a small Hellenistic town in the West in the time when St. Paul wrote at Corinth his letter to the Romans, his heart full of thoughts of the West, which began for him with Italy.² Besides the indescribably valuable general impression, there are plenty of striking details. The Pompeian inscriptions CHRISTIAN (?) and Sodoma Gomora have given rise to a well-known controversy.³ In the *Macellum*⁴ at Pompeii we can imagine to ourselves the poor Christians buying their modest pound of meat in the Corinthian Macellum (1 Cor. x. 25), with the same life-like reality with which the Diocletian maximum tariff called up the picture of the Galilean woman purchasing her five sparrows. How full the wall-inscriptions are of popular wit and popular coarseness! What an abyss of degradation in the higher classes opens beneath us when the obscene Pompeian bronzes, costly in material and execution, are shown in the Naples Museum! One single example of a contribution to our knowledge of the New Testament from Pompeii may be given here in more detail.¹

In the Revelation of St. John (xiii. 18) we read :—

“ Let him that hath understanding, count the number of the beast: for it is the number of a man, and his number is, Six hundred three score and six.” (Some ancient authorities read 616 instead of 666.)

Scientific commentators are probably by this time agreed that the name to be “counted” must be found by “gematria,” i.e. we must look for a name the letters of which, taken separately in their ordinary values as numerals and added together, will make up the sum of 666 or 616. Now it has been generally assumed by exegetists hitherto that gematria was a specifically Jewish form of the numerical riddle, and therefore attempts have often been made, especially in recent times, to solve the number 666 or 616 by means of the Hebrew alphabet. As a matter of fact, however, the interchange of numbers for words and words for numbers was not unknown to the ancient Greeks, as even Greek lexicons² tell us. The patristic writers, in so far as they attempt to solve the riddle with the Greek alphabet, show that such numerical puzzles were not entirely foreign to the Greek world. From Pompeii, however, we learn that they were current among the people at the very time in which the New Testament was being written. A. Sogliano³ has published graffiti (wall-scribblings) from Pompeii, i.e. not later in

Ἀμέριμνος ἐμνήσθη Ἀρμονίας τῆς ἰδίας κ(υ)ρία(ς) ἐπ' ἀγαθῷ ἧς ὁ ἀριθμὸς μέ' (or αλε') τοῦ καλοῦ ὀνόματος [cf. James ii. 7].

Amerimnus thought upon his lady Harmonia¹ for good. The number of her honourable name is 45 (or 1035).

φιλω ἧς ἀριθμὸς φμε'. | I love her whose number is 545.

These graffiti, in date not far removed from the Revelation of St. John, certainly suggest new riddles, but they also establish, besides those already pointed out, the following facts :—

(1) They are concerned with names of persons, which names for some reason or other are to be concealed.

(2) The name was concealed by resolving it into a number. In all probability single letters were given their usual values as numerals and then added together.

(3) The similar numerical riddle in the Revelation would not necessarily seem Semitic, i.e. foreign, to the men of the Greek-speaking world. Examples of such playing with numbers have been found on inscribed stones² of the Imperial period at Pergamum, which was one of the cities of the Apocalypse (Rev. ii. 12 ff.). Quite recently Franz Bücheler³ has proved how widespread the habit was at that time, and a passage in Suetonius (Nero, 39), hitherto obscured by false conjectures, has been cleared up by his brilliant discovery that the name "Nero" is there resolved numerically into "matricide."

(4) In solving the apocalyptic numbers 616 and 666, occurring in a Greek book, it is not only not unfeasible to start from the Greek alphabet,¹ it is in fact the most obvious thing to do.

In any case the graffiti at Pompeii bring the Book of Mysteries a little bit nearer to the Hellenistic world—the world in which it originated, but from which the exegetists have often divided it by an all too deep gulf, although in language and coloration it shows clearly the reflection of that world.

A visit to Pompeii and the study of its records are most excellent means of supplementing one's Eastern impressions, gathered from moderately sized towns of Asia Minor, such as Magnesia on the Maeander, or Priene, and deepened by the magnificent publications² of the inscriptions and other discoveries. The same is true of Hierapolis³ and many smaller towns of Asia.⁴

A good deal is also known about the civilisation of the islands in the Imperial age. The islands of the sea between Ephesus and Corinth were not outside the sphere of St. Paul's missionary labours. There are scholars who, in the 16th chapter of Romans, assume with the utmost calmness wholesale migrations of poor Christians from Asia to Rome,¹ and who make the slave Onesimus mentioned in Philemon run over from Colossae to Rome or Caesarea, as if it were something quite ordinary; and yet these same scholars regard a journey of St. Paul from Ephesus to Crete as wildly improbable. But the islands were easier to get at than many towns in the interior of Asia Minor: the list of perils encountered by Paul the traveller in 2 Cor. xi. 23 ff. shows us that travelling by land was fraught with great difficulties for a poor man.² From our authorities we must certainly assume that St. Paul made many more voyages than we are now able to determine in detail. He had suffered shipwreck three times already before the Second Epistle to the Corinthians was despatched³; and the Pastoral Epistles also mention voyages of the apostle and his companions, of which

¹ The assumption breaks down at once from the fact that Aquila and Priscilla were at Ephesus when the First Epistle to the Corinthians was written (1 Cor. xvi. 19), and that their house was a centre for church meetings. Some six months later the Epistle to the Romans was written, so that within that short time Aquila and Priscilla must have not only gone to Rome, but also have got together again at once the church meeting in their house mentioned in Rom. xvi. 5.—To describe the personal names in Rom. xvi. as specifically Roman on the strength of inscriptions found in the city of Rome is about as safe as to describe Wilhelm, Friedrich, Luise as specifically Berlin names because they are found on Berlin tombstones. The names referred to are found swarming in inscriptions, papyri, and ostraca all over the Mediterranean world.—Least appropriate of all to a letter to Rome is the passage Rom. xvi. 17-20.

nothing more is known, the principal one being a voyage of St. Paul to Crete.¹ This last reference points at least to the early establishment of Christianity in the islands.² Even if it is not yet certain whether the "angel" inscriptions from Thera are Christian,³ the islands would deserve our attention for at least one reason, viz. that the inscriptions found there furnish a quantity of valuable information bearing on the history of the "New Testament" vocabulary.⁴ Especially noteworthy are the inscriptions of Delos,⁵ Thera,⁶ and Cos.⁷

Immeasurable, next, is the abundance of light, ever increasing from year to year, that has been shed

upon the great New Testament cities of Asia Minor,¹ illuminating the mission-field proper of Primitive Christianity. The spaciousness and boldness of their proportions, the strength and grace of their architecture, the equable beauty of their Graeco-Roman works of art (from the marble miracles of masters in sculpture down to the humblest of the terra-cottas and small bronzes), the old places of worship, venerable still in ruins—whoever has seen, and seeing has reanimated, all this in ever royal Pergamum,² in the solemn and oppressive gravity of Ephesus,³ and in the silent and but recently desecrated fairy-world of Miletus-Didyma,⁴ will have acquired, even if all

Calder, in The Times, 11 Nov., 1909, throws light on the conduct of the natives of Lycaonia who called Barnabas Jupiter, and Paul Mercury, Acts xiv. 11 ff. An inscription of the 1st cent. A.D. (?) found at Baluklaou, about a day's ride south of Lystra, records the dedication of a statue of Mercury to Jupiter by men with Lycaonian names, thus proving the existence of a local cult of these deities, to which Ovid's location of the story of Baucis and Philemon (Metamorphoses viii. 620-625) also points. TR.]

² For Pergamum cf. p. 12, n. 2 and p. 17 above. On Good Friday, 1906, I had the advantage of seeing Pergamum under the guidance of Wilhelm Dörpfeld. Actual inspection of the place suggests that "Satan's throne" (Rev. ii. 13) can only have been the altar of Zeus; no other shrine of the hill-city was visible to such a great distance and could therefore rank so typically as the representative of satanic heathendom.

the details were to escape him, a permanent possession—the recognition of the grandeur of that world of which a Paul had ventured to say that it was passing away.¹ Was this remark of the artisan missionary dictated by the futile envy of one excluded from it? or did it come from the consciousness of an inner power superior even to that world? And the quiet little Book containing the simple evidences of that power—does it not seem strangely great when we open it among the ruins of Ephesus? greater than the whole Bibliotheca Christiana of after times with its frequent sins of prolixity?

Some traditional lines in the picture of the ancient world would have to be altered if we were to try to-day to depict that world after a study of its own records.² Most of us, probably, at some time or other, have heard that the world to which the Gospel message came was thoroughly corrupt. Many writers have in good faith painted the situation in the Roman Imperial period in the darkest colours; and in cases where there was really nothing but light to be seen, people have been only too often inclined to call the virtues of the heathen brilliant vices.

This dark picture of the ancient world is due, I think, to two main facts: it was drawn from the literary records of the age, and it was influenced by the polemical exaggerations of zealous Fathers of the Church. St. Paul must not be held responsible for it; in spite of his feeling of superiority to this transitory world and its hollow wisdom, and in spite of his knowledge of the corruption of a great city,¹ he did not overlook the light places, and he was never a mere advocate abusing his opponent. It was otherwise with the later champions of the faith, when the world had declared war to the knife against it. They had to struggle against the world outside and the world in their own camp, and it is not difficult to understand their passionateness and to pardon their heated exaggerations.

But the Christian historian of to-day ought to be just in his judgments—because he is a Christian, and, if not for that reason, then because he is entered on the roll of the religion that came out victorious in the struggle. At any rate he ought to notice which lines are caricatured. And it ought to be equally clear to him that the merely literary records of an age are insufficient to give him a reliable picture.² As a general rule, literature is a reflex of upper-class opinions. Doubt, denial, satiety, frivolity always proclaim themselves much more loudly in the upper than in the vigorous and unspoiled lower classes. A lower class that begins to doubt and scoff is generally copying the educated classes ; it always lags some few dozen years behind the class above it, that amount of time being required for the impurities to filter down. Then, however, purification takes place automatically ; the giant body contains its own means of healing.

The Roman Imperial period of literature is, as a matter of fact, rich in notes of negation and despair ; the luxury of the potentates, with its refinements in the cultivation of obscenity and brutality, certainly does give the age a dark look. But even in the literature forces of a different kind are heard and felt. The popular writers on ethics in the narrower sense, to whom Georg Heinrici¹ so insistently refers, served positively to prepare the way for Christianity ; but, not to mention them, what an attractive personality, taken all round, is Plutarch—and there are many other good names besides his that could be mentioned in the cultured and powerful class. And then, when we descend into the great masses and listen to them at their work, in the fields, in the workshop, on the Nile boat and the Roman cornships, in the army and at the money-changer's table,—he must be blind who cannot see that many were leading useful, hard-working, dependable lives, that family feeling and friendship bound poor people together and strengthened them, that the blessings of an old and comparatively established civilisation were felt in the smallest villages, and, chiefly, that a deeply religious strain went through that entire world.

3. This brings us to that feature of the world contemporary with Primitive Christianity which is for us, of course, the most important, viz. its religious position. The new texts are here extraordinarily productive, for a large proportion of them are of a directly religious nature. There are the innumerable epitaphs, in poetry and prose; there are prayers and dedications, temple laws and sacrificial regulations; there are private letters with a religious colouring, horoscopes, amulets, cursing tablets and magical books; there are oracles and thankful accounts of deliverance from dire peril¹ or of miraculous cures at the great shrines.² And if any one doubts the words of these texts—setting aside the assurances of intercession in the papyrus letters as mere phrases, and the reports of cures as simply so much sacerdotal fraud—perhaps figures will appeal to him. Let him calculate the sums of money that were devoted to religious purposes in the Imperial period on the evidence of dedicatory inscriptions and the papyri³—from the monster presentations to great temples immortalised in marble splendour, to the drachmae and obols of the Isis collections for which a receipt was issued to the Egyptian peasant on a miserable potsherd.⁴

Were it possible to collect before us, in all their shades of variety, the original documents attesting the piety of the Gentile world in the age of the New Testament, and could we then with one rapid glance survey them all, we should feel as St. Paul did at Athens. After passing through the streets of that one city he was fain to acknowledge that the men he had seen were "extremely religious."¹

The impression is deepened when we gaze actually upon some of the great places of worship which were still in repute in the Hellenistic period of Roman history. We experience over again in all their complexity the feelings of the ancient devotee, so far as they were determined by the prevailing atmosphere of the sacred place itself. It is possible, of course, unconsciously to read something modern into our interpretation of the temple walls and ordered columns rising from the debris. Above all, the imposing solitude which usually surrounds us as we stand beside these ruins to-day may easily mislead us into giving a false touch to the picture we piece together for ourselves. But the great things cannot be sophisticated: sky, and sea, and cliff, gorge and plain, fig-tree and olive grove, and over all the frolic strife of sunlight and shadow—these are eternally the same. And it cannot be altogether wrong to assume that the feelings which come over us to-day² on the site of the ancient shrines were experienced also by the pious men of old who discovered and consecrated, settled and tended these places. All the effects come under one of two main heads: either the beauty and loveliness of the sacred place enlarge the heart to solemn devotion, or else the grandeur and the vastness make it sink shuddering before the terrible and the sublime.

There is Olympia, with the sprightly charm of what might almost be a German hill-landscape—a place of joyous festal celebration. There is Epidaurus, the goal of sick pilgrims, in its green forest solitude remote from all the world. And Eleusis, above the silent bay bounded by the cornfields and olive plantations of the plain and by the cliffs of Salamis;—the spirit of this sanctuary is rendered with marvellous feeling in the most deeply religious work of ancient sculpture that I have ever seen, the Eleusinian Triptolemus relief in the Museum at Athens.

² The following is a sketch of my own impressions in April and May, 1906, on visiting the places named.

There Corinth lies, above the gleaming beauty of her rock-crowned gulf, not unlike Eleusis, only vaster, severer, more masculine, possessing the oldest temple on Greek soil, and overhung by the defiant mass of the Acrocorinthus. There in her pride, and strength, and beauty the Acropolis of Athens sits enthroned above the crowded Polis, bearing sway over the sea and the islands, and calling up feelings of patriotic devotion.

And then the island shrines: the temple of Aphaea in Aegina, on a steep wooded height, with wide expanses of sea visible through the tops of evergreen trees; lovely Delos in the circle of her humbler sisters; Thera, opening up to us from primeval peaks, still sacred to this day, the beauty of sea and sunshine stretching away into the blue limitless distance. Finally the great seats of worship on the coast of Asia Minor: Pergamum, Ephesus, and Miletus-Didyma.

But nothing can approach the shrine of Delphi in dignity and vastness. The giants of the prime whose hands piled those frowning mighty walls of rock, the Phaedriads,¹ have here created for the sacred precinct a background of indescribable solemnity; not even the extravagant profusion of costly votive offerings in bronze and marble can have banished that solemnity in ancient times. And, on the highroad, if you let the eye stray downward from the bare rocks opposite into the valley, the stream that you see there far below is a stream—or rather, sea—of gloomy, silent olive woods: naught save the distant streak of some bay on the Corinthian Gulf, lit up for a moment as it catches a glimpse of the sun, gives to the heroic outlines of this awesome picture a kindlier touch.

The inspection of all these venerable and solemn places, their buildings and their sculptures, increases our knowledge of ancient piety beyond what we know from the inscriptions and papyri. This is chiefly because in those texts—one need only recall the magical texts, for instance—it is the coarser forms of religion, strongly suggestive of “heathenism,” that come prominently to the front. If we did not know it before, we learn now from this inspection that, even at the time of the great turning-point in religious history, there were various levels of piety. Just as in museums we see the neolithic bowl side by side with the masterpiece of Attic vase-painting, so in Hellenism we find on the one hand vestiges of primitive folklore, surviving in secret corners and at cross-roads under cover of the night, and on the other hand temples bathed in the streaming sunlight, and votive gifts which nothing but a high religious culture could have created. And if we could awaken again to life the choirs that sang in those temples and are now for ever silenced, we should probably be still further convinced of the refinement of that culture. The earliest Christians certainly appreciated the mature beauty of the religious art of the world surrounding them, as we know from the comparatively unpolished writer of the Apocalypse. A good deal of the colouring of his visions is obviously derived from the religious art and usage¹ of Hellenistic Asia Minor; but he shared the popular liking for strong effects, and it was certainly the more startling shades that he adopted.

4. Amid the tangle of religions in the Hellenistic world of the Mediterranean—this must at least be hinted in this connexion—certain great lines become clearer and clearer, chiefly as a consequence of the discoveries of inscriptions: we see the other religions that competed with Christianity because they were themselves missionary religions. The great problems suggested merely by the new material already published are by no means all solved or even attacked yet,² but we can already reconstruct with great certainty the religious map of the world in the Imperial period,³ at least at some of the main points.

To take the chief instance, Greek Judaism, the mighty forerunner of Christianity as a world-religion, yielded up its hidden inscriptions; papyri and the evidence of literary writers did the rest,—and so

Emil Schürer¹ was able to write his very full sketch of the Jews of the Dispersion.

Franz Cumont's work on Mithras² is monumental, not only in the sense of being written from the monuments; but there are also smaller investigations, such as Alfred von Domaszewski's on the religion of the Roman army³ or Hugo Hepding's on Attis,⁴ which would have been impossible without modern epigraphy.

Finally there remain to be mentioned the important additions to our knowledge due to the light that has been thrown upon the worship of the sovereign, particularly emperor-worship, in antiquity—a form of cult whose importance is becoming more and more obvious in the religious history of the Graeco-Roman period. Comprehensive works have lately been published by E. Kornemann⁵ and J. Toutain.⁶ I hope to be able to show later on in this chapter how, considered in contrast with that of emperor-worship, much of the terminology of the earliest Christian worship acquires once more its original distinctive clearness.

5. One other thing the student of Primitive Christianity owes to the new texts. It is something to have perceived the religious feelings that animated the great world contemporary with the New Testament, and to have learnt to know its forms of worship, but much greater is the fact that ancient souls, seemingly lost to us for ever, have leapt into life once more.

It has always been characteristic of Christianity from the beginning, that, as it lived in the souls of individuals, so it influenced the individual soul. Christianity is in the very front rank as regards the discovery and culture of individual souls. Its oldest documents are without exception reflexes of souls. What a soul is reflected in the words of Jesus! What souls has He depicted with a few touches in His parables and words of disputation. And St. Paul's letters are soul-pictures in such high degree that their writer is probably the best-known man of the early Empire: not one of his celebrated contemporaries has left us such frank confessions. But to understand the progress of the new faith through the world we must know the spiritual constitution of the men from whom the missionaries came and to whom the message and pastoral care of the missionaries were addressed.

That these were men of the non-literary lower and middle classes has been so often indicated in these pages from a variety of points of view, that I should have no objection if this thesis were described as a main feature of my book. Some little time ago there was given us an admirable aid towards dividing off these classes from the upper class which, being possessed of power, wealth, or education, is the most seen and heard in the literature of the Imperial age and elsewhere. Under the auspices of the Berlin Academy of Sciences three scholars, Elimar Klebs, Hermann Dessau, and Paul von Rohden, presented us with a three-volume work,¹ Prosopographia Imperii Romani Saec. I. II. III., uniting in one great alphabetical catalogue 8,644 men and women who are known from literature, inscriptions, etc., in the three centuries from Augustus to Diocletian, which of course mean to us the primitive period of Christianity. Turning the pages of these volumes we find among the men of the Imperial age the deified favourite Antinous, but not John the Baptist; Apollonius of Tyana, but not Jesus of Nazareth; the celebrated robber-chief Bulla Felix, but not Paul of Tarsus; the historian Flavius Josephus, but not the Evangelist Luke, to say nothing of the vanished souls in the lists of salutations in the letters of St. Paul. This is no mere accident; the editors intentionally neglected "the endless multitude of plebeians that crowd the pages of ecclesiastical and legal writers."²

I will not press the sentence; I will not refer in confutation of it to the isolated examples of insignificant persons who of course have found their way into this book of grandees here and there. But one thing I will say: That endless multitude, as it is rightly called, which seems too big to be comprehended historically, and which begins below the upper eight-thousand found worthy to be catalogued in the Berlin Prosopographia, deserves attention because in it Primitive Christianity grew up and expanded. One of the greatest pictures in the Revelation drawn by one of that multitude and consecrated by the tears of those nameless ones shows¹ the "great multitude, which no man could number, of all nations, and kindreds, and people, and tongues, standing before the throne, and before the Lamb, . . . who came out of great tribulation, . . . and who shall hunger no more, neither thirst any more."

And now to-day the new texts have brought a wonder to pass. That ancient world of the insignificant and the many who hungered and thirsted, which seemed to be inaccessible save to the dreamy eye of the seer, and hopelessly lost to the scholar, now rises up before us in the persons of innumerable individuals. They sow grains of wheat once more in the furrow blessed by the Nile; they pay their drachmae for tax and impost, duty and rate and collection; they travel by boat, on camels or on donkeys to the capital, to fill the halls of justice with their quarrels and abuse; adventurous youths climb on board the imperial ships bound for Italy; in silent devotion the survivors observe ancestral custom at death and burial. And so it goes on from generation to generation, from the days of the Septuagint to the gospels and the church-meetings of the Pauline mission, on to Diocletian and the baptised Caesars: in the lower stratum there is always the same bustle of so many humble individuals eating, drinking, sowing, tilling, marrying and given in marriage.

But out of the ceaseless rhythm of wholesale existence souls emerge, individual souls, in which the scholar may recognise types of ancient personal life. The unparalleled value of the papyrus letters is this, that they bring before us with all possible truth ancient souls and spiritual conditions in the non-literary classes.

What is it that makes these newly discovered papyrus letters such splendid evidence of the soul-life of the ancients?

What literature has to show us in the way of souls is a product of art, often of a high form of art, but even then generally only a drawing from the model. That which is literary cannot be completely naïve. We cannot be sure whether it is the real face or only a mask of concealment worn by a player when the Emperor Hadrian writes these verses¹ before his death:—

“Soul of mine, pretty one, flitting one,
Guest and partner of my clay,
Whither wilt thou hie away,— Pallid one, rigid one, naked one—Never to play again, never to play?”

And the works of the plastic arts? The marbles and bronzes recovered from the ruins of ancient

“Animula vagula blandula hospes comesque corporis, quae nunc abibis in loca pallidula rigida nudula nec ut soles dabis iocos!”

For the “naked soul” cf. for instance St. Paul, 2 Cor. v. 3. [These verses are of acknowledged difficulty to translate. Prior, Pope, Byron, and Christina Rossetti are amongst those who have essayed the task. The version in the text is by Merivale. TR.]

cities and from the sea-bed around the coasts are certainly not soul-less; but to whom would the athlete of Ephesus in the Theseion at Vienna, or the youth of Anticythera at Athens, have ever revealed his soul? These marvellous presentments of the human body so captivate us that we do not think of inquiring about their souls until we have said farewell to them and the bronzes can no longer understand our questioning. Who would venture to make the great eyes of the Egyptian mummy-portraits speak, or attempt to read the personal secrets of even the portrait-busts of the Imperial period? The connoisseur only ventures on hesitating attempts at interpretation when he is supported by literary tradition.¹

And the men who speak to us on the inscribed stones—do they stand quite naturally before us? Are they not in the same publicity as the stone, and are not their words calculated for publicity? We could indeed make shift to patch together some of their personalities, but we could put no life into them. The imperial physician and imperial murderer G. Stertinius Xenophon of Cos,² the contemporary of St. Paul, is a case in point. The editor of the inscriptions of Cos has tried to make him live again and has found in him a figure for an historical romance³;—a figure, certainly, but no soul.

Two generations later a Lycian millionaire, Opramoas of Rhodiapolis, thrusts himself forward with boastful ostentation among the crowd of inscriptions from Asia Minor. On the walls of the heroön destined for the reception of his mortal body we find still to-day nigh upon seventy records which, in order that his name might not perish, he engraved in marble, immortalising his money benefactions and other services, as well as the honours he received from emperors, procurators, and municipal associations. Thanks principally to modern archaeology¹ this man with the full-sounding name has attained his object: Opramoas is to-day, at least in a few scholars' studies, a sort of celebrity. But where is his soul? So far as it was not identical with his treasure, it is not to be found on all those great marble tablets.² And if we were to receive it from the hand of the angel who was sent to demand it of the rich man in the night, it would not be a soul that felt at home with the poor souls of the New Testament.

Even where the inscriptions seem to bear a more personal note, we do not always find a personal manifestation. In the poetical epitaphs, especially, there is much that is borrowed and plenty of second-hand feeling. It would be rash, for example, to say that Chrysogonus of Cos, with his eighty-three years, was a great drinker merely on the strength of the epigram on his tomb (Figure 44), even supposing he was himself responsible for the epitaph.

This feeble epigram,³ the metre of which is here

² The Opramoas inscriptions are, however, of great value to us as religious history; first in illustration of the powerfully sarcastic parable of the rich fool (Luke xii. 16-21) and the other allied types of the "rich man," and secondly in contrast with the spirit of Matt. vi. 1-4.

One, Chrysogonus hight, lies here, of nymphs an adorer, Saying to each passer-by, “Drink, for thou seest the

83 years.

The exhortation to drink in anticipation of approaching death is one of the well-known formulae of ancient popular morals³ (often, no doubt, of popular wit), and is by no means rare in epitaphs.⁴ We can therefore draw no certain conclusion whatever as to the spiritual constitution of Chrysogonus in particular from his epitaph. We know little about the old man beyond his name and a cult to which he was devoted; his soul has disappeared for ever.

The epitaphs of antiquity as a whole are of this service, that they reflect for us the emotions of a class of men rather than the innermost thoughts of individuals. Stones with long metrical inscriptions almost provoke us, as we seek for something personal behind the ornate forms, to cry sometimes in the words of a medieval inscription from Heraclia on the Black Sea⁵:—

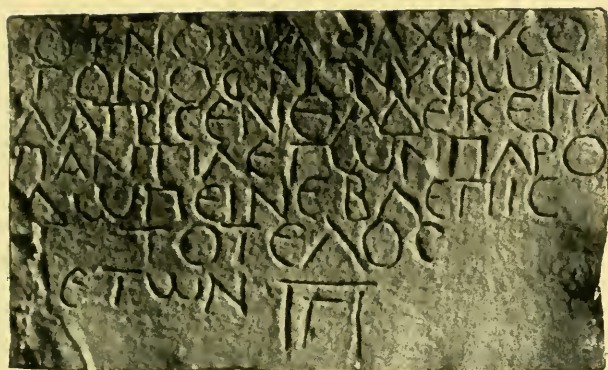

FIG. 44.—Epigram on the Tomb of Chrysogonus of Cos. Marble Altar, Imperial Period. Now built into the wall of a house in Cos. By permission of Rudolf Herzog and the publishing house of Theodor Weicher (Dieterich'sche Verlagsbuchhandlung).

“If then the stones cry out, as saith the Word, Send forth a shout, thou voiceless, soul-less rock!”

But the stones remain dumb: they have preserved for us no souls.

Souls, however, living souls from the great perished multitude, good and bad, beautiful and ugly, joyful and tremulous, flutter towards us with the papyrus letters¹ that have been snatched from the rubbish of villages and little towns in Egypt. Those who, being vilely deceived in their hopes of autograph MSS. of philosophers and poets, cast the letters aside as lumber owned by the obscure, will fetch them out again when they have learnt to appreciate the value of non-literary naïveté. The more obscure the writer, the more naïve will be the letter, at least as concerns the thought of future publication. It may be said with some certainty that most of the papyrus letters written by unknown men and women of Egypt at the time when the New Testament was growing and consolidating are in the above sense of the word completely naïve and reflect single definite situations in the outer or inner lives of their writers with the greatest sincerity.

This estimate of the papyrus letters is quite in harmony with ancient ideas on the subject, as may be shown by reference to Demetrius,² a theorist on the art of letter-writing, who says very finely that in writing a letter one draws a picture of one's own soul, and in nothing is the personality better reflected than in a letter.

Interpretative scholarship ought certainly to come first to an understanding about the methods of regarding, explaining, and reanimating these ancient self-portraits. We are not yet sufficiently practised in this new art. The best way is to read the texts in conjunction with other scholars, with continuous discussion of the various possibilities of interpretation. What one regards as mummy-like another will perhaps make live again. At any rate let us read without unduly lauding any supposed child of nature to the skies ; let us brand as brutal what is brutal, and accord no praise to vulgar narrowness. Not on any account, however, must we come to the letters with the condescending superiority of the man from town who knows "the people" only from kail-yard fiction or from stage-representations, and perhaps from holiday tours in quest of old farmhouse furniture ; who thinks Hodge stupid, and is hugely amused at his lack of culture. In these texts we are dealing not with curiosities but with human destinies ; sometimes only the humorous vexations of everyday life are concerned—and then it is permissible to smile—but often the trouble is very deep and real. We must leave our linguistic red-pencils at home, for these are not Greek examination papers to be corrected, and we shall do better to ask ourselves whether soldiers and day-labourers of the present day write any better. These texts should be read only by those who have hearts for the common people, who feel at home among fields, vineyards, and dykes, guard-rooms and rowing-thwarts, and who have learnt to read the lines of a hand distorted by toil.

There is Alis, wife of the day-labourer Hilarion, growing anxious as her hour of trial approaches: a half-sentimental, half-brutal letter¹ is all that her husband writes her from the capital, on 17 June in the year 1 B.C.

Irene² is called upon to console a family that has just been plunged into mourning, but the poor empty soul has nothing to give but tears and a few good words dictated to her by custom; and yet we cannot deny her our sympathy.

Or a young Egyptian soldier who has just been saved from peril on the sea by the lord Serapis, lands in Italy and writes to his father³ while the new impressions are fresh upon him. A thankful, hopeful temperament this soldier's, as he looks forward to the future, nor does he lose his attractiveness after years of hard service.⁴ The same hearty goodwill comes out in the letter of another soldier.⁵

And Nearchus prattles on to Heliodorus⁶ about his travels, and we see him in sacred places carving the names of his friends with intercessory prayer.

Or we hear the prodigal Antonis Longus⁷ coming to himself and expressing his contrition in these moving sentences in the first person: "I walk about in rags, I am naked. I beseech thee, mother, be reconciled to me! I have been chastened. I know that I have sinned."

And so it goes on, the texts are inexhaustible. The same papyri that we made use of above to make clear the characteristics of the non-literary letter can thus be employed also in solving a greater and still more profitable problem—that of entering into the nature of individual souls among the non-literary middle and lower classes of ancient society. One soul is added to another, a new one in every letter, and we even possess whole bundles of connected letters from one and the same family,¹ and are able to see into the relationship between various families of the same social stratum. Every new soul, however, makes clearer to us the "world" which was the object of the missionary labours of St. Paul and his successors. This world was composed of human souls. The interest of the first missionary generations was directed, not to ancient systems of philosophy and speculative ways of combating them, but to the salvation of souls. It is, however, most highly probable that the souls of men on the coasts of Syria, Asia Minor, and Greece were not essentially different from those of their Egyptian contemporaries. This is what I meant by saying above that we may take the souls of the Egyptian letter-writers as types of the ancient soul in general.² If individual proof be wanted, think of the surprising similarity between the Prodigal Son depicted by Jesus the Galilean and the real soul of the Egyptian Antonis Longus. But chief stress must be laid on the total impression received; any one coming from the soul-life of the New Testament to the papyri finds himself in no strange world, and whoever comes from the papyri to the New Testament will encounter familiar states and expressions of emotion at every step.

¹ Cf. the 14 letters from the correspondence of the veteran L. Bellenus Gemellus, of the years 94-110 A.D., which were found in a house at Kaşr el-Banât (the ancient Euhemeria) in the Fayûm, and published in Fayûm Towns, Nos. 110-123. The handwriting of the letters written by the man himself shows the advance of age. The letters yield an unusually rich lexical harvest. For the epistolary formula οὗς (ὅν) ἐγὼ ἀγαπῶ ἐν ἀληθείᾳ, "whom I love in truth" (2 John 1, 3 John 1), there is analogy in the Gemellus letters 119_{26f}. (c. 100 A.D.) and 118₃₅ (110 A.D.), τοὺς φιλοῦντες ἡμᾶς (σέ) πρὸς ἀλήθειαν, "who love us (thee) according to truth." U. von Wilamowitz-Moellendorf, Göttingische gel. Anzeigen, 1901, p. 37 ff., made a beginning in the work of turning these letters to scientific account.—There should also be mentioned the correspondence of Heliodorus and others (see p. 227 f. above), part of which is published in the Amherst Papyri, Nos. 131-135, the rest at Heidelberg still awaiting publication. There are also connected family letters in the Berliner Griechische Urkunden, etc. The correspondence of Abinnaeus, which next follows in the Christian Imperial period, has been mentioned above, p. 206.

² G. Heinrici says very justly (Der literarische Charakter der neutestamentlichen Schriften, p. 58): "It is, I think, no unjustifiable generalisation to regard the Egyptian papyrus letters as typical of the vulgar epistolary style of antiquity at large." The same generalisation may be extended to the writers of the letters.

Someday perhaps, when all those men and families of the ancient lower classes have received individual attention and been made to live again, the command will go forth from the citadel of learning that they and the countless others whose names alone are mentioned shall also be enrolled. The personal register of the upper classes, which is a book of contrast to the New Testament, will then be supplemented by a personal and family register of the humbler classes, a book not of contrast but of contact. And in this book, in which peasants and artisans from Egypt jostle legionaries from Britain and the frontiers of Germany, in which traders from Syria and the Black Sea encounter with slaves from Ephesus and Corinth—in this book of the Forgotten we shall not search in vain for the Baptist, for Jesus, and for St. Paul.

Souls of the ancients! Before we leave them let me commend their study to all those—I do not wish to blame them—who are so fond of chasing the psyche of “modern” man with the butterfly-net. If we look to the really great events and possibilities of the inward life, those “ancient” souls seem to be separated by no such great interval from our own. That is to say, the papyri teach us the continuity of human soul-life in all its main movements. If I may give practical point to the observation, they diminish, when heed is paid to things of the soul, the interval that many people nowadays, exaggerating the value of things intellectual, feel between themselves and the New Testament.

6. When the individual souls of antiquity have been studied so far that a beginning can be made with the personal register of the humbler classes, we shall recognise better than we can at present how greatly Christianity met the needs of those souls. The depth of meaning will become clearer and clearer in that dream-vision¹ of a man of Macedonia begging the Apostle of the Gentiles, then in Asia, to "come over into Macedonia, and help us." Indeed, the old and the new came to meet each other like two hands stretched out for a friendly clasp.

In this connexion the fact which occupied us in the second chapter appears in a new light, I mean the fact of close relationship between the early Christian missionary language and the popular language of the age. The scholars who isolated "New Testament" Greek did not reflect that by so doing they closed the doors of the early Christian mission. Paul would have found no "open door"² if he had not been to the Greeks "a Greek," i.e., in our context, if he had not in the Hellenised world spoken to Hellenised men in the Hellenistic popular language.

other apostles are, in a much higher degree than has probably been supposed, at home also in the world of cultural, especially of religious, ethical, and legal ideas peculiar to their Hellenistic age, and they are fond of making frequent use of details taken from this world of thought. This is a fact which is not completely separable from the one discussed in Chapter II.; at many points philology and social history overlap.¹ This is particularly true in the case of technical ideas and liturgical formulae, but also where institutions of the surrounding world exert an influence on the figurative language of religion.

One of the marks of the highly popular style of St. Paul's missionary methods is that in many passages of his letters we find St. Paul employing a usage particularly familiar and intelligible to popular feeling—I mean the technical phraseology and the cadence of the language of magic.

I have tried elsewhere² to show that the curious sentence about “the marks of Jesus”³ is best understood if read in the light of a magical formula handed down in a Leyden papyrus.⁴

So too in the case of the directions to the Corinthian church concerning the punishment of the transgressor who had committed sin with his step-mother,⁵ the full meaning does not come out until the passage is read in connexion with the ancient custom of exorcism, i.e. devoting a person to the gods of the lower world. A person who wished to injure an enemy or to punish an evil-doer consecrated him by incantation and tablet to the powers of darkness below, and the tablet reached its address by being confided to the earth, generally to a grave.¹ A regular usage was established in the language of these execrations,—a usage common to antiquity. The only difference between Jewish and pagan execrations probably lay in the fact that Satan took the place of the gods of the lower world. In form, however, there must have been great similarities.² This is seen in the words of St. Paul to the Corinthians:—

“Gather together in the name of the Lord Jesus, ye and my spirit, and in fellowship with the power of our Lord Jesus deliver such a one unto Satan for the destruction of the flesh, that his spirit may be saved in the day of the Lord Jesus.”³

Two technical expressions are here adopted from the ritual of cursing. The phrase “deliver unto Satan that . . . ,” recurring in 1 Tim. i. 20, corresponds to the formula in the London Magical Papyrus 46_{334 ff.}:—

“Daemon of the dead, . . . I deliver unto thee N. N., in order that . . . ,”⁴ and even the unobtrusive little word σύν, “with,” “in fellowship with,” is technical in just such contexts as this: we find it not only in the Paris Magical

Papyrus,¹ but also on a much older Attic cursing tablet of lead (3rd cent. B.C.)² :—

“I will bind her . . . in fellowship with Hecate, who is below the earth, and the Erinyes.”

All this proves therefore that the apostle advises the Corinthian church to perform a solemn act of execration.

And in the concluding lines of 1 Corinthians, which St. Paul wrote with his own hand,³ there is a reminiscence of the cadence of ancient curses imitated from the language of legislation :—

“If any man loveth not the Lord, let him be anathema.”

With this compare the epitaph from Halicarnassus already cited above⁴ :—

⁴ Page 94, n. 4 to ἐπικατάρατος.

Akin to this is the parallelism between St. Paul's asseveration¹ :—

“I call God for a witness upon my soul” and the formula of an oath taken under Augustus and recorded in an inscription from Galatia,² in which the taker of the oath says, in case of breach of the oath :—

“I pronounce a curse against myself, my body, soul, goods, children, etc.”³

The clearest example of the use of technical expressions taken from magic is perhaps the phrase “bond of the tongue.”⁴ In the story of the healing of the deaf and dumb man St. Mark (vii. 35) says :—

“And straightway his ears were opened, and the bond of his tongue was loosed.”

Most commentators, I think, have lightly pronounced “bond of his tongue” to be a “figurative” expression, without realising the technical peculiarity and therewith the point of the “figure.” But running throughout all antiquity we find the idea that a man can be “bound” or “fettered” by daemonic influences. It occurs in Greek, Syrian, Hebrew, Mandaean, and Indian magic spells.⁵ In Greek we even have a detailed magical prescription for "binding" a man,¹ besides large numbers of inscriptions dealing with the matter. One of the oldest of these is the following, a leaden tablet from Attica of the first half of the 4th cent. B.C. (Fig. 45), which I give here as read by Adolf Wilhelm² :—

I bind these all down to Hermes, who is beneath the earth and crafty and fast-holding and luck-bringing, and I will not loose them."

Many other Attic binding-tablets have been published by Richard Wünsch,⁵ but we also possess examples from other localities and of later date.

The cases are particularly common in which a man's tongue is specially to be "bound." There are no less than thirty of Wünsch's Attic tablets which bind or curse the tongue. And in the Louvre at “Bound and fast held be the mouth and fast held the tongue of curses, of vows, and of invocations of the gods. . . . Bound be the tongue in its mouth, fast held be its lips, shaken, fettered, and banned the teeth, and stopped the ears of curses and invocations.”

A binding-charm of essentially similar nature is found on an ostracon of the later Empire from Ashmunēn in Egypt, in which pagan and Jewish elements are mixed (Fig. 46). It is in the possession of Mr. F. Hilton Price, of London, and was first published (as a Christian text) by F. E. Brightman.² A similar charm was pointed out by Wilcken³ in the London Papyrus⁴ No. 121_{935 ff.}, and there are other examples in allied texts of magical prescriptions against anger.

The text of the ostracon (not yet fully established) is as follows :—

tongue of a dumb person was often considered in ancient popular belief to have been "bound" by some daemon. This view fits in with the wider complex of widespread ancient beliefs that certain diseases and morbid conditions were caused in general by daemonic possession. Jesus Himself says (Luke xiii. 16) that Satan had "bound" a daughter of Abraham eighteen years. He means the crooked woman previously mentioned in the context, "which had a spirit of infirmity," and whose "bond" was loosed on the Sabbath. It seems probable, therefore, that St. Mark's "bond of his tongue" is also a technical expression. The writer will not merely say that a dumb man was made to speak—he will add further that daemonic fetters were broken, a work of Satan undone. It is one of those thoroughly popular touches which helped Christianity to make its way in the world!

The formulae usual in ancient accounts of healing, of which we know plenty from inscriptions at Epidaurus and other places where cures were wrought, of course cannot have been unknown to the apostles. As St. John's story of the healing of the man born blind finds a parallel in a Greek inscription from Rome,¹ reporting the cure of a blind man, and as St. Matthew describes St. Peter's peril on the sea in the style of a popular narrative of rescue,² so also St. Paul clothes one of his most remarkable confessions in the style of the ancient texts relating to healing. Speaking of his severe bodily affliction, the "thorn in the flesh, the messenger of Satan to buffet me," he confesses³:—

just as M. Julius Apellas, a man of Asia Minor in the Imperial age, narrating on a marble stele how he was cured at the shrine of Asclepius at Epidaurus, acknowledges with regard to one of his various ills¹:—

“And concerning this thing I besought the god.”

The parallel is all the more remarkable because the verb² used for “beseech” does not seem to be exactly common in such a context. It is moreover factually important, as showing very clearly that Christ³ was occasionally, even by the piety of St. Paul, taken as the Saviour in the literal sense of “Healer.” Whoever fears that the New Testament may suffer from the discovery of this parallel should read the whole inscription of M. Julius Apellas and the whole twelfth chapter of 2 Corinthians side by side, and then compare the souls and the fortunes of the two men of Asia Minor, Apellas and Paul. Two patients besought their Healers for healing, and to which of them did his Healer give the most? What is greater? the cures of Apellas’ various ailments, following one another in rapid succession, and paid for in hard cash to Asclepius of Epidaurus? or the answer that St. Paul received⁴ instead of bodily healing?—

“My grace is sufficient for thee: for My strength is made perfect in weakness.”

And which is the more valuable text? the advertising inscription on marble, ordered by the god himself¹? or that line of a letter, wrung from suffering and sent in confidence to the poor folk of a great city, without a thought that it would survive the centuries?

7. But there are other ways in which St. Paul made use of the forms and formulae of his age, as they presented themselves to him, principally, no doubt, in inscriptions. When in reviewing his past work he professes²:—

“I have kept faith,” and when, probably in the 2nd cent. A.D., the Ephesian M. Aurelius Agathopus, full of gratitude to Artemis, makes the same profession in an inscription in the theatre³:—

“I kept faith,”

both no doubt are drawing from the same source, from the stock of formulae current in Asia Minor.⁴ On the other hand the metaphor employed by the apostle in the same passage,⁵

“I have fought the good fight. . . . Henceforth there is laid up for me the crown of righteousness . . . ,” reminds one of phrases in an inscription relating to an athlete of the 2nd cent. A.D., also in the theatre at Ephesus⁶:—

No doubt St. Paul in his time read inscriptions like this.

The following is a still more striking case of contact between the apostle and the world. In the Pastoral Epistles we read ¹ :—

“ Rebuke not an elder, but intreat him as a father ; the younger men as brethren : the elder women as mothers ; the younger as sisters in all purity.”

In the same way a pagan inscription of the 2nd or 3rd cent. A.D., at Olbia on the Black Sea,² in honour of Theocles, the son of Satyrus, boasts of him as “ bearing himself to his equals in age as a brother, to his elders as a son, to children as a father, being adorned with all virtue.”

Though much later in date than St. Paul this inscription is not dependent on the New Testament ; both it and St. Paul have been influenced by old tradition. Pithy sayings of ancient teachers, such as Wetstein³ has collected in his note on the New Testament passage, were in the time of St. Paul commonplaces of popular ethics. They were taken over by him (perhaps after reading them in inscriptions) with a sure instinct of appreciation for noble thought and pregnant expression, and in the same way their echo reaches us again later on from the Black Sea.

Much might be said about ancient popular ethics in general and the fruitful effects of the same on early Christian popular ethics. The otherwise somewhat barren inscriptions,¹ especially complimentary and funeral inscriptions, yield an abundance of ethical detailed material. The praises lavished on the meritorious citizens, or the thankfully commemorated good qualities of deceased persons, will not always tell us what those people were really like, but all such statements reflect the moral ideals of the men who set up the inscriptions, and whatever seems stereotyped may be reckoned part of the world's fixed moral consciousness at the time. It is once more a mark of St. Paul's fineness of perception that, far from denying the world all moral attributes, he credits the heathen² with a general fund of real morality regulated by conscience, in the same way as he praises the depth of their religious insight.³

In previous works⁴ I have given a not inconsiderable number of examples of the secular origin of supposed exclusively "New Testament" ethical concepts. For the sake of argument I was bound to deal only with the more unusual concepts, when of course the agreement between the apostles and the world would be most striking, but if attention is paid also to the concepts belonging to everyday morality we discover an extensive common ground on which the apostles could and did take their stand. Particularly as we read the pastoral exhortations of St. Paul in his letters (and not least in the Pastoral Epistles) and others imitating them, we feel that, instead of being spoken to the winds like so much obsolete wisdom, they were bound to find in the popular consciousness of that day a powerful reverberating medium.

Here is an example. The expressions "conversation," "to have conversation,"¹ etc. (A.V.), in an ethical sense (= "behaviour, manner of life," "behave, live," etc., R.V.), are frequent in the apostolic writers, and many commentators explain them as a Hebraism. But they were common to the ancient world as a whole, and it is senseless to make a difference between Semitic and non-Semitic. I have given the necessary quotations elsewhere already,² but here is an additional illustration that appeals to the eye: an inscription³ (Fig. 47) in honour of the Gymnasiarch Apollodorus, the son of Pyrrhus, on a marble pedestal in the gymnasium at Pergamum, of the Roman period (after 133 B.C.). It reads thus:—

ὁ δῆμος ἐτίμησεν Ἀπολλόδωρον Πύρρου
 χρυσῶι στεφάνωι καὶ εἰκόνι χαλκῇ ἀρετῆς ἔνεκεν καὶ εὐνοίας τῆς εἰς ἑαυτὸν καὶ διὰ τὸ γυμνασιαρχήσαντα ὃ καλῶς καὶ ἐνδόξως ἀναστραφῆναι.

The people honoured Apollodorus, the son of Pyrrhus, with a golden crown and a brazen image by reason of his virtue and goodwill towards them, and because of his good and glorious behaviour when he was Gymnasiarch.

Extraordinarily interesting are the cases in which the apostles, being still in living contact with the lower classes, adopt the fine expressions which, coined in the workshop and the marketplace, are a terse and pithy presentment of what the people thought was good. There is a phrase we find on the tombstone of a humble man¹ of the early Empire in a country district not far from the home of St. Paul in the south-west of Asia Minor. To the eye wearied with the bombast of overloaded eulogy in showier inscriptions it appears scarcely noticeable at first, and yet how eloquent in reality is this simple form of praise: Daphnus, the best among the gardeners, has raised himself a hero's resting-place (Heroön), and now has reached this goal,²

“after that he had much laboured.”

To any one with a sense for beauty in simplicity these lines concerning the much labour of the gardener Daphnus are as a green spray of ivy tenderly clasping the tombstone of its old friend. And the words of St. John, in the Revelation, are no less racy of the people when, recording the voice heard from heaven, he gives a slight Asiatic tinge³ to an old Biblical phrase,⁴ and says that the dead “rest from their labours.”⁵ St. Paul, however, the artisan missionary, catches the popular tone of his native country even better when he boasts¹ of an Ephesian Mary, while she was yet living, that “she much laboured for you.”

² This translation of the brief ταῦτα of the inscription (cf. p. 189, n. 7 above) is very free.

Again, in a Roman cemetery² of later date, we hear the old popular phrase re-echoed by a wife who praises her husband,

“who laboured much for me.”

In fact, with regard to all that Paul the weaver of tent-cloth has to say about labour, we ought to place ourselves as it were within St. Paul's own class, the artisan³ class of the Imperial age, and then feel the force of his words. They all become much more lifelike when restored to their original historical milieu. “I laboured more abundantly than they all”⁴—these words, applied by St. Paul to missionary work, came originally from the joyful pride of the skilled weaver, who, working by the piece, was able to hand in the largest amount of stuff on pay-day. The frequent references to “labour in vain”⁵ are a trembling echo of the discouragement resulting from a width of cloth being rejected as badly woven and therefore not paid for. And then the remark to the pious sluggards of Thessalonica⁶:

“That if any should not work, neither should he eat.”

⁶ 2 Thess. iii. 10, εἰ τις οὐ θέλει ἐργάζεσθαι, μηδὲ ἐσθιέτω.

I remember a newspaper controversy in which a social reformer, not quite so well up in his Bible as he should have been, denounced this text as a modern heartless capitalist phrase. As a matter of fact, St. Paul was probably borrowing a bit of good old workshop morality,¹ a maxim coined perhaps by some industrious workman as he forbade his lazy apprentice to sit down to dinner.

In the same way we can only do justice to the remarks in the New Testament about wages by examining them in situ, amidst their native surroundings. Jesus and St. Paul spoke with distinct reference to the life of the common people. If you elevate such utterances to the sphere of the Kantian moral philosophy, and then reproach Primitive Christianity with teaching morality for the sake of reward, you have not only misunderstood the words, you have torn them up by the roots. It means that you have failed to distinguish between the concrete illustration of a popular preacher, perfectly spontaneous and intelligible in the native surroundings of Primitive Christianity, and a carefully considered ethical theory of fundamental importance to first principles. The sordid, ignoble suggestions, so liable to arise in the lower class, are altogether absent from the sayings of Jesus and His apostle, as shown by the parable of the labourers in the vineyard and the analogous reliance of St. Paul solely upon grace.

Still more instructive than the parallelism of single ethical phrases in popular use are the formulae in which pairs of ideas or whole series of ideas have united. When in Titus ii. 4, 5 the young women are exhorted to be "loving to their husbands, loving to

Ἰούλιος Βάσσος
 Ὀτακιλία Πώλλη

Julius Bassus to Otacilia Polla, his sweetest wife. Loving to her husband, and loving to her children, she lived with him unblamably 30 years.

That this formula was no extempore formation is proved by a quotation from Plutarch, by an inscription from Paros³ of Imperial age, and by a metrical inscription from Tegea.⁴ The collocation "loving to her husband and soberminded" is also not rare; it occurs in epitaphs for women of the Imperial period at Termessus in Pisidia,⁵ Prusias on the Hypius in Bithynia,⁶ and Heraclia on the Black Sea.⁷

Whole series of ethical concepts are brought together in the well-known Primitive Christian lists of virtues and vices. These were no new creations, but based on Jewish and pagan series—this has long been recognised.¹ But it will be as well to give up looking for the models exclusively in philosophical literature, although there may still be much to find there.² The popular lists of virtues and vices are of more direct importance; they show better than the philosophical texts what had really made its way among the people. Scattered in many museums we find specimens of the counters³ used in an ancient game resembling draughts: one side of the counter bears a number (up to 25 or 30 or 40), and on the other side is a word addressed to a person, occasionally in verbal form, e.g. “Art thou glad?” or “Thou wilt scarcely laugh,”⁴ but nearly always substantives or adjectives, generally in the vocative case. These give us a large number of popular names of vices⁵ and virtues; the Greek loan-words among the Latin lists show the Hellenistic influence, and the decidedly vulgar form of the Latin words indicates that the game was a popular one. Although we have not yet recovered all the counters necessary for the game, and the sequence of the counters is not yet certain, the parallels with St. Paul strike us immediately. Take, for instance, the list of vices⁶ in 1 Cor. vi. 9, 10,

⁶ Even Lietzmann (loc. cit.) considers this list to be purely Jewish.

With the exception of "covetous," which is rather colourless, and "idolaters," which is not to be expected in a pagan list, all these will be found substantially, word for word, on the counters.¹

The comic dramatists afford us help in completing these popular lists of vices. No certain explanation has yet been given of the mention of such rare crimes as parricide and matricide in the list of vices in 1 Tim. i. 9 f. The text there enumerates:—

"The lawless and disobedient, the ungodly and sinners, unholy and profane, murderers of fathers and murderers of mothers, manslayers, whoremongers, them that defile themselves with mankind, menstealers, liars, perjured persons."

Now compare the "scolding" of Ballio the pander in the Pseudolus of Plautus²: quite a number of the most characteristic terms of abuse in that popular scene occur again in St. Paul's list, either literally or in forms nearly synonymous.³

Nor is the parallelism between the New Testament

The last word ἄρπαξ was current as a loan-word in Latin comedy. In St. Paul it should probably not be translated "robber" but rendered by some other word, like "swindler" ("extortioner," A.V., R.V.). "Robbers" were λησταί, with whom St. Paul became acquainted on his journeys (2 Cor. xi. 26).—For μαλακός cf. letter No. 2 above, p. 150, n. 4.

and the world wanting in the corresponding lists of virtues. This is shown by comparing 2 Peter i. 5, 6 with an inscription from Asia Minor, 1st cent. B.C., in honour of one Herostratus, the son of Dorcalion.¹ The inscription mentions successively the faith, virtue, righteousness, godliness, and diligence of the person to be honoured; and the apostle incites his readers to diligence in faith (= belief), virtue, knowledge, temperance, patience, godliness, brotherly kindness, and love.²

8. The correspondences we have noted so far relate only to isolated details of the popular religion and popular morality of the world contemporary with the apostolic texts. The cumulative effect even of such details should be sufficiently remarkable, but there are besides in the New Testament whole groups of thought, the peculiar strength and beauty of which we can only appreciate from the vantage-ground of the ancient world. Recent discoveries have made it possible to reconstruct large portions of Hellenistic popular law, which was previously known only in miserable fragments, and this gives us an uncommonly valuable means of judging some of the figurative religious language of Primitive Christianity. It has of course long been known, and monographs have been written to prove, that St. Paul was strongly influenced by legal ideas ; but the fact was not sufficiently accounted for by comparisons either with Roman or with Jewish law, the latter, so far as the Diaspora was concerned, being probably for the most part a dead letter. We now receive help of a far different order from the law that was alive in the popular consciousness up and down the Hellenistic area in which the New Testament originated. A few examples will confirm this statement.

The stupendous force of dogmatic tradition, and the fact that the word *slave*¹ with its satellites has been translated servant, to the total effacement of its ancient significance, in our Bibles, have brought it about that one of the most original and at the same time most popular appraisals of the work of Christ by St. Paul and his school has been, I think, only vaguely understood among us.² I refer to the metaphor of our redemption by Christ from the slavery of sin, the law, and idols—a metaphor influenced by the customs and technical formulae of sacred manumissions in antiquity.¹ I should like to illustrate a little more particularly this instance of St. Paul's having been influenced by the popular law of the world in which he lived.

Inscriptions at Delphi have been the principal means of enlightening us concerning the nature and ritual of manumission with a religious object in ancient times.² The French archaeologists have discovered and published a vast number of records of manumission relating to several different centuries,³ and particularly to that one which gave rise to the New Testament. After two thousand years the records stand to-day almost uninjured on the polygonal retaining-wall of the temple of Apollo (Fig. 49), the blocks of which seem, despite their bulk, to have collectively the effect of a poem in stone. Climbing greenery and blue blossoms greet you from the joints of the stone if you read the texts in springtime.¹

But these are not records of something peculiar to Delphi. Manumission on religious grounds was practised all about Parnassus and probably throughout ancient Greece, and it even made its way into Jewish and Christian ecclesiastical custom. As examples from places outside Delphi I may refer to inscriptions at Physcus in Aetolia² (sale to Athene, 2nd cent. B.C.), at Amphissa³ (sale to Asclepius, Imperial period), and also in Cos⁴ (sale to Adrastia and Nemesis [?], 2nd or 1st cent B.C.). Ernst Curtius⁵ has collected records from Naupactus (sale to Dionysus), Chaeronia, Tithora, and Coronis (sale to Serapis), Chalia (sale to Apollo Nesiotes), Elatia and Stiris (sale to Asclepius), Daulis (sale to Athene Polias). Th. Macridy has published records from Notion.⁶ We find this kind of manumission among Jews in two stone records from Panticapaeum,⁷ the first of which can be certainly dated 81 A.D.; and there is a record⁸ of great interest from Gorgippia,

41 A.D., referring to the cult of "the Most High God." These Jewish and Judaeo-pagan records¹ are of great importance in our problem, as sure proofs of the influence of the pagan rite on Jewish Hellenism² in the time of the apostle Paul. Finally, it has long been recognised by experts that "manumission in the church"³ was nothing but a Christianised form of the old Greek custom.

But between the Greek usage and the practice of the early Church there stands St. Paul, who made the ancient custom the basis of one of his profoundest contemplations about the Christ.

What was this custom? Among the various ways in which the manumission of a slave could take place by ancient law⁴ we find the solemn rite of fictitious purchase of the slave by some divinity. The owner comes with the slave to the temple, sells him there to the god, and receives the purchase money from the temple treasury, the slave having previously paid it in there out of his savings. The slave is now the property of the god; not, however, a slave of the temple, but a protégé of the god. Against all the world, especially his former master, he is a completely free man; at the utmost a few pious obligations to his old master are imposed upon him.

The rite takes place before witnesses; a record is taken, and often perpetuated on stone.

The usual form of these documents must have been extremely well known, because they are so numerous. It is like this¹:—

Date. “N.N. sold to the Pythian Apollo a male slave named X.Y. at a price of — minae, for freedom (or on condition that he shall be free, etc.).” Then follow any special arrangements and the names of the witnesses.

Another form, which does not occur elsewhere, but which makes the nature of the whole rite particularly plain, is furnished by an inscription² of 200–199 B.C. on the polygonal wall at Delphi:—

Date. ἐπρίατο ὁ Ἀπόλλων
ὁ Πύθιος παρὰ Σωσιβίου

St. Paul is alluding to the custom referred to in these records when he speaks of our being made free by Christ. By nature we are slaves of sin⁷;

⁷ Rom. vi. 17, 20, 6, 19; Titus iii. 3. The passage in Rom. vi. 6, “that the body of sin might be destroyed,” is ambiguous, since “body” (σῶμα) may also mean “slave.”

the Jew is furthermore a slave of the law,¹ the heathen a slave of his gods.² We become free men by the fact that Christ buys us. And He has done so :—

“Ye were bought with a price,” says St. Paul in two places,³ using the very formula of the records, “with a price.”⁴ Again,

“For freedom did Christ set us free,⁵ . . . ye were called for freedom”⁶ —in these words of St. Paul we have literally the other formula of the records.⁷ In numerous records of manumission the nature of the newly obtained liberty is illustrated by the enfranchised person's being expressly allowed henceforth to “do the things that he will.”⁸

St. Paul, therefore, is referring to the danger of a relapse into servitude when he points to the possible

² Gal. iv. 8, 9.

⁴ τιμῆς (timās) is quite a stereotyped expression in the records, of course with the addition of a definite sum. But τιμῆς can also be used absolutely, as shown by the great document containing royal ordinances of Euergetes II., 118 B.C., The Tebtunis Papyri, No. 5_{185, 191, 20}, cf. the editorial note p. 50 f. Luther's translation “dearly bought” can hardly be right. St. Paul is not emphasising the amount of the price, but the fact that the redemption has taken place.

⁸ ποιῶν ὃ κα θέλη, cf. Curtius, pp. 17, 39, and especially Mitteis, Reichsrecht und Volksrecht, p. 390.

result of the conflict between flesh and spirit with these words¹:—

“that ye may not do the things that ye would.”

Numerous manumissions, again, expressly forbid, sometimes under heavy penalties, that the enfranchised shall ever “be made a slave”² again. We now see how wicked is the intention of those³

“who . . . spy out our liberty, which we have in Christ Jesus, that they might bring us into bondage.”

And we understand warnings like this⁴ in the letters:—

“For freedom did Christ set us free: stand fast therefore, and be not entangled again in a yoke of bondage,” and the still more moving exhortation⁵:—

“Ye were bought with a price, become not slaves of men.”

Christians cannot become slaves of men because they have become “slaves of Christ”⁶ by purchase, and have entered into the “slavery of God”⁷ or “of righteousness.”⁸ But, as in every other case of purchase by a god, the slave of Christ is at the

⁵ 1 Cor. vii. 23. The allusion is to moral slavery to human lusts and desires. Christians should be slaves of the brethren.

same time free: he is "the Lord's (i.e. Christ's) freedman,"¹ even when he is outwardly the slave of a human lord. When, further, in numerous documents this pious obligation is imposed upon the enfranchised slave²:—

"let him remain with N.N." (his former master), or when we hear occasionally³:—

"let Cintus abide with Euphronius . . . behaving decently," we are reminded of expressions in St. Paul, e.g.

"let him abide with God,"⁴ and especially of this one:—

"that which is decent, and attending upon the Lord without distraction."⁵

If this last example is not fully parallel to the pagan formulae because the reference in St. Paul is to the new master, it corresponds nevertheless to the Jewish formulae of manumission from Panticapaeum,⁶ which lay on the enfranchised slave the obligation to be loyal to the synagogue.⁷

These parallels do not exhaust the cases in which the apostle took his stand on this custom of the ancient world. All that St. Paul and St. John¹ have to say about freedom has this background; but, most important of all, the frequently misunderstood conception of redemption,² i.e. buying-off and hence deliverance (from sin, the law, etc.), belongs, as St. Chrysostom knew and pointed out,³ to the same complex of ideas. The inscription of Cos, above referred to, uses this very word—a rare one—to describe sacral manumission.⁴

St. Paul's predilection for this whole group of images would be most beautifully accounted for if we knew him to have been previously acquainted with the Greek form of our Lord's deeply significant saying about the ransom.⁵ And we have no reason to doubt that he was.⁶ But when anybody heard the Greek word λύτρον, "ransom," in the first century, it was

⁴ It is called first ἀπελευθέρωσις, and then ἀπολύτρωσις (Herzog, p. 39 f.): those who perform the ἀπελευθέρωσις are not to make formal record of the ἀπολύτρωσις until the priests have reported that the necessary sacrifice has been made. See p. 325, n. 4.

natural for him to think of the purchase-money for manumitting slaves. Three documents¹ from Oxyrhynchus relating to manumissions in the years 86, 100, and 91 or 107 A.D. make use of the word. "Under Zeus, Ge (= Earth), Helios (= Sun) for a ransom,"² is the phrase used in the first two documents, and it is not impossible that all three adumbrate traces of sacral manumission.³

I refrain from entering into a criticism here of the remarkable obscurations and complications which this whole circle of ancient popular metaphors has undergone at the hands of modern dogmatic exegesis. I would rather point out that St. Paul, in expanding and adapting to the Greek world⁴ the Master's old saying about ransom, was admirably meeting the requirements and the intellectual capacity of the lower classes. For the poor saints of Corinth, among

⁴ It is a matter of great importance how gospel conceptions were expanded and adapted to the world, when we try to understand Christianity as a world religion. The most important example is the expansion of the originally Palestinian word "the Christ" (=the Messiah) into "Christ" as the world-wide name of God. Further details will be found in a small work by me, Die Urgeschichte des Christentums im Lichte der Sprachforschung, Tübingen, 1910.

whom there were certainly some slaves, he could not have found a more popular illustration¹ of the past and present work of the Lord. A Christian slave of Corinth going up the path to the Acrocorinthus about Eastertide, when St. Paul's letter arrived,² would see towards the north-west the snowy peak of Parnassus rising clearer and clearer before him, and every one knew that within the circuit of that commanding summit lay the shrines at which Apollo or Serapis or Asclepius the Healer bought slaves with a price, for freedom. Then in the evening assembly was read the letter lately received from Ephesus, and straightway the new Healer was present in spirit with His worshippers, giving them freedom from another slavery, redeeming with a price the bondmen of sin and the law—and that price no pious fiction, first received by Him out of the hard-earned denarii of the slave, but paid by Himself with the redemption-money of His daily new self-sacrifice, rousing up for freedom those who languished in slavery.

The question how this ancient metaphor of St. Paul's is to be interpreted in detail, I will merely mention. The chief point to examine is whether St. Paul regards redemption through Christ as a single summary act performed once for all in the past, or (and this is to me more probable) as an act of liberation experienced anew, in each single case of conversion, by every person newly incorporated in Christ. Further it may be asked whether the price is a necessary link in the chain of thought, or merely a pictorial detail of no ulterior significance. It is clear from 1 Peter i. 18, 19 that at a very early period the price was understood to be the Blood of

Christ. The union of the idea of manumission with the idea of sacrifice was made easier for the ancient Christians by the fact that sacral manumission, e.g. at Cos, was not complete without sacrifice.¹ Finally should be pointed out the affinity between the idea of redemption (manumission) and the idea of forgiveness (remission) of our trespasses which was established for the ancients by the legal procedure they were accustomed to. In cases of non-payment of a money debt the system of personal execution² allowed not only arrest but even slavery for debt.³

The series of Gospel and Primitive Christian metaphors to which we have thus alluded—metaphors connected with debt and forgiveness (or remission)—are likewise taken from the legal practice of antiquity, and might receive many an illustration from the new texts. I have pointed out elsewhere that the word ὀφειλή, “debt,” supposed to be peculiar to the New Testament, is quite current in the papyri.⁴ So too there are plenty of original documents on papyrus to teach us the nature of an ancient acknowledgment of debt.⁵ A large number of ancient notes of hand have been published among the Berliner Griechische Urkunden, and probably every other collection of papyri contains some specimens. A stereotyped formula in these documents is the promise to pay back the borrowed money, “I will repay”⁶; and they all are in the debtor's own hand,¹ or, if he could not write, in the handwriting of another acting for him with the express remark, "I have written for him." Thus, for instance, in a very vulgar note of hand for 100 silver drachmae written in the Fayûm² in the first century A.D. for two people who could not write by one Papus, who was himself not much of a writer, we have (Figure 50³):—

It now becomes clear that St. Paul, who had playfully given the Philippians a sort of receipt,⁴ is in the letter to Philemon (18 f.) humorously writing on behalf of the runaway slave Onesimus an acknowledgment of debt to his master:—

| εἰ δέ τι ἡδίκησέν σε ἡ ὀφεί- λει, τοῦτο ἐμοὶ ἐλλόγα⁵. ἐγὼ Παῦλος ἔγραψα τῇ ἐμῇ χειρί, ἐγὼ ἀποτίσω⁶. | "If he hath wronged thee or oweth thee ought, put that on mine account. I Paul have written it with mine own hand, I will repay it." |

The parallelism between the legal formulae and the letters of St. Paul becomes still clearer when we observe that the ancient note of hand generally took the form of a letter acknowledging the debt.

Some ancient customs connected with the law of debt must be at the root of the celebrated passage in Col. ii. 14 where the technical expression "hand-writing" (= bond) is employed in a religious sense and brought into a remarkable connexion with the cross. Christ, says the apostle, has forgiven us all the debts incurred by our trespasses. Then, with a piling-up of cognate metaphors,¹ the writer continues:—

ἐξαλείψας τὸ καθ' ἡμῶν χειρόγραφον . . . καὶ αὐτὸ ἤρκεν ἐκ τοῦ μέσου, προσηλώσας αὐτὸ τῷ σταυρῷ.

"Having blotted out the handwriting . . . that was against us . . . and He hath taken it out of the way, nailing it to the cross."

"The handwriting nailed to the cross"—does that simply mean "it is crucified," i.e. dead, ineffective? That would be possible. But probably the image is a much livelier one²: there must be an allusion to some custom which is not yet known to us. If we are unable to point to the source of "the bond nailed to the cross" it may at least be allowed in passing to refer to "the cross on the bond." We have learnt from the new texts that it was generally customary to cancel a bond (or other document) by crossing it out with the Greek cross-letter Chi (X). In the splendid Florentine papyrus,¹ of the year 85 A.D., of which use has been made before (Figure 41), the governor of Egypt gives this order in the course of a trial :—

The same technical word, χιάζω, “I cross out,” occurs in other similar contexts in papyri of New Testament age,³ but the Florentine passage is especially valuable as showing that the custom of crossing out (which has endured down to our own day) was not a mere private one, but also official. We have moreover recovered the originals of a number of “crossed-out”⁴ I.O.U.’s: there are several at Berlin,⁵ some at Heidelberg,⁶ and in other collections. The subject is perhaps not without some bearing on the origin of later allegorical and mystical trifling with the cross-letter Chi among Christians.

Starting once more from the I.O.U. formulae of the Epistle to Philemon we can touch on yet another conception of Hellenistic law which was early applied metaphorically within the Christian range of religious ideas, viz. the conception of agency. Here also the new texts have opened up quite new views.

“Roman law, as is generally and according to the sources in the Corpus Juris rightly taught, gave on principle no recognition to direct agency, i.e. acting in the name and at the expense of the principal, in whose person arise the rights and duties resulting from the business. Certain exceptions, especially direct agency in the acquisition of property, were gradually acknowledged, ‘but the most important department of private law, that of obligatory contracts, remained entirely closed to direct agency.’” In these words Leopold Wenger¹ sketched what was known of agency in antiquity before the papyri came to enlighten us. Afterwards he himself in a very informing monograph on *Die Stellvertretung im Rechte der Papyri*² worked up the material so far accessible in the newly discovered legal documents of Hellenistic and Roman Egypt, explaining from the original records, which are sometimes wonderfully well preserved, the facts concerning agency in public law, agency in actions, and agency in private law. It follows that the idea of agency must certainly have been one of the best-known elements of popular law in Egypt, and from many other analogies we may perhaps assume that Egypt, whose bundles of documents have been re-discovered, is here also only the paradigm for the other portions of the former Empire of Alexander, whose records, so far as they relate to actions and private law, have almost entirely disappeared.

The supposition is perhaps confirmed by the use which St. Paul, the man of Asia Minor, makes of the idea of agency, which had certainly become dear to him also through his Jewish education.¹ The wish expressed (Philemon 13) that Onesimus, the slave who has run away from his master Philemon at Colossae, and is now with St. Paul, might serve the apostle in his captivity as the agent² of Philemon, would be, if there is really a legal allusion here at all, explainable even on Roman principles—the slave represents his master.³ But when St. Paul, after speaking of his convert Onesimus in verse 10 as his child, goes on to pledge himself for him financially in terms of a bond, this corresponds best to a father's agency for his son, as in the Greek law and Hellenistic law of the papyri.⁴

Altogether, therefore, the idea of agency, which is employed in several important statements of St. Paul about the past and present work of Christ, cannot be regarded as a foreign body inside Hellenistic Primitive Christianity, but must be reckoned one of the many thoroughly popular means to make things plain which the earliest propaganda adopted. More important than single passages on the vicarious work of Jesus in the past is the general view taken of His vicarious present activity. This view, hinted at in the gospels,⁵ was probably started by St. Paul⁶; it grew to full maturity and attained classical formulation⁷ in the

Here again one can see how closely the "Semitic" may come in contact with the Hellenistic in matters of culture.

² That is the meaning of ὑπὲρ σου in Philemon 13, just as in so many papyri the scribe representing an illiterate debtor writes ὑπὲρ αὐτοῦ, "for him," "as his agent," e.g. p. 153 above, letter 3, and p. 335.

Johannine writings. Christ is our Paraclete, i.e. advocate, our representative in the trial, our intercessor, comforter. Again the new texts help us to understand what a thoroughly popular conception was covered by this primitive and deeply expressive element of our religious vocabulary. The work of the advocate in the Hellenistic world has been illustrated by Mitteis,¹ Gradenwitz,² and Wenger³ with so many speaking examples, notably the reports of actual cases, which have lost nothing of their freshness and colour, that it has become simply tangibly clear.⁴ It should be specially pointed out that the Pauline formula "through Christ," so often wrongly explained, but recognised by Adolph Schettler⁵ in its true character and relative unambiguity, is in many passages intelligible only if we start from the thought of the Paraclete.⁶

Much more might be said about the background of the New Testament figurative language, but I am not aiming here at completeness of statement. I am content to have shown by some examples⁷ the importance of the whole subject. Perhaps the most necessary investigation still waiting to be made is that relating to the word διαθήκη, which so many scholars translate unhesitatingly "covenant." Now as the new texts help us generally to reconstruct Hellenistic family law and the law of inheritance, so in particular our knowledge of Hellenistic wills has been wonderfully increased by a number of originals on stone or papyrus. There is ample material to back me in the statement that no one in the Mediterranean world in the first century A.D. would have thought of finding in the word διαθήκη the idea of "covenant." St. Paul would not, and in fact did not. To St. Paul the word meant what it meant in his Greek Old Testament, "a unilateral enactment," in particular "a will or testament." This one point concerns more than the merely superficial question whether we are to write "New Testament" or "New Covenant" on the title-page of the sacred volume; it becomes ultimately the great question of all religious history: a religion of grace, or a religion of works? It involves the alternative, was Pauline Christianity Augustinian or Pelagian? ¹

9. Closely connected with the lower classes by the ties of popular language and non-literary culture, by the realism of religious imagery, by popular morality and popular law, Primitive Christianity displays moreover in one group of its most characteristic utterances a tone that might be interpreted as one of protest against the upper classes, and which certainly has that effect, although it arose less from conscious political or social antipathies than from the passionate determination of the monotheistic cult of Christ to tolerate no compromises. I mean the strongly pronounced tone of protest against the worship of the Caesar.¹ In so far as the religious adoration of the sovereign is the crown and summit of the culture of the ruling classes,² the Primitive Christian abhorrence of emperor worship does form an upper line of demarcation, and in course of time it unites here and there with those political and social instincts of the oppressed which had long been present in Judaism.

Politically the earliest Christianity was comparatively indifferent,³ not as Christianity, but as a movement among the humble classes, whose lot had undoubtedly been on the whole improved by the Imperium. The fire of national hatred of the foreigner which smouldered in Palestine remained practically confined to this area, and seems to have gained no hold among the disciples of Jesus at the outset. Their opponents were none other than His opponents, viz. the leaders of the nation itself, and the expectation of the coming kingdom of God is much more of a polemic against the Scribes and Pharisees than against the Romans.

St. Paul, too, in spite of occasional conflicts with Roman officials on his journeys, had probably in his own person more often experienced the blessings than the burdensome constraint of State organisation. In what was to him personally the most momentous legal affair of his life he asserted his rights as a citizen¹ and appealed to the Caesar. He sees no theoretical difficulties in all the small political questions that affect the humble individual: to respect and pray for the powers in authority is as natural to him as the payment of tribute and custom.² It is no right view of the subject to say that Paul was indifferent to political problems because of his religious expectations of a coming end; if anything, those expectations were calculated to make him interested in politics. The fact is that political interest and political activity were on the whole remote from the class to which he belonged. The comparatively marked indifference of St. Paul to politics is not specifically connected with Primitive Christianity, its causes are secular and social.

All the more sensitive, however, was Primitive Christianity in its own most special field, the religious, on which all its passion was concentrated. The deification of the Caesars was an abomination to

Christianity from the beginning. It is very probable that this antipathy was inherited by the daughter from monotheistic Judaism. In those words of quiet delicacy in which Jesus names both the Caesar and God, we see already the place reserved for God which belongs to Him alone.¹ Two generations later the Book of the Revelation, coming from the classical land of emperor worship, gives most powerful voice to the religious contrast, which by that time was heightened by the political resentment of the oppressed. This access of passion would be historically unintelligible were it not for the years that lie between the calm dignity of Jesus and the volcanic ardour of the Apocalypse. With the lapse of time, the religious antithesis must have been felt more and more acutely until at length imprinted on the Christian conscience in indelible characters.

And so it really was. If it has not been seen before, that is because the literary sources of the Imperial age are particularly deficient on the point. The new texts, however—some of which are themselves direct evidence of the cult of the Caesar—enable us to judge of the feelings aroused by exhibitions of the cult of the sovereign even at the time of St. Paul's mission in the minds of those who had nothing but their God in Christ and their conscience.

It must not be supposed that St. Paul and his fellow-believers went through the world blindfolded, unaffected by what was then moving the minds of men in great cities. These pages, I think, have already shown by many examples how much the New Testament is a book of the Imperial age. We may certainly take it for granted that the Christians of the early Imperial period were familiar with the institutions and customs that the Empire had brought with it. That they were familiar even with apparently out-of-the-way points is shown, for instance, by the allusion in Rev. xiii. 16 f. to the custom, now known to us from the papyri, of imprinting on deeds of sale and similar documents a stamp which contained the name and regnal year of the Emperor and was called, as in the Revelation, a charagma. To the examples previously given¹ from Augustus to Trajan there now comes a welcome addition in the form of an imperial stamp affixed to documents² from the Fayûm, dated 48 A.D. As a concrete illustration I reproduce³ here an actual-size facsimile of one of the original stamps, a soft plate of limestone now in the Berlin Museum (Figure 51). The legend, the letters of which are of course reversed, runs:—

| Λ λε Καίσαρος γρ(αφείλον ?) | | In the 35th year of the Emperor Scribe's chamber (?) |

If such superficial details were known among the people, how much more so the deification of the emperor, with its glittering and gorgeous store of the very loftiest terms employed in worship, compelling every monotheistic conscience to most powerful reaction! Such jewels were never intended for mortal brow! And so from out the despised mass of the unknown Many the hard and deformed hands of the saints in Christ stretch forth and appropriate from the crown of the Caesars such old and new divine insignia as offered, and deck therewith their Son of God, whose they are, because before

He was set over them He had stood beside them ; who became poor with the poor, who humbled Himself with the lowly and humble and had lived submissively in the likeness of a slave, and who after a shameful death on the cross had been raised by God and had received a name which is above all names.¹

And that is what we may actually observe. The cult of Christ goes forth into the world of the Mediterranean and soon displays the endeavour to reserve for Christ the words already in use for worship in that world, words that had just been transferred to the deified emperors or had perhaps even been newly invented in emperor worship. Thus there arises a polemical parallelism between the cult of the emperor and the cult of Christ, which makes itself felt where ancient words derived by Christianity from the treasury of the Septuagint and the Gospels happen to coincide with solemn concepts of the Imperial cult which sounded the same or similar.

In many cases this polemical parallelism, which is a clear prophecy of the coming centuries of martyrdom, may be established by very ancient witness. In other cases the word which corresponds with the Primitive Christian term of worship may turn up only in later texts relating to the cult of the emperors. It could hardly be otherwise considering the fragmentary nature of the tradition.² I am sure that in certain cases a polemical intention against the cult of the emperor cannot be proved; but mere chance coincidences might later awaken a powerful sense of contrast in the mind of the people.

² The New Testament also uses technical terms of contemporary constitutional law which by accident are not known to us from other sources until later, e.g. Acts xxv. 21, eis tēn τοῦ Σεβαστοῦ διάγνωσιν, "for the decision of Augustus." διάγνωσις is a technical expression for the Latin cognitio, but is not found elsewhere until the end of the 2nd cent. A.D. in the title of an official in a Roman inscription, Inscriptiones Graecae, XIV. No. 1072 (also with the genitive τοῦ Σεβαστοῦ, as in the Acts), ἐπὶ . . . διαγνώσεων τοῦ Σεβαστοῦ, "a . . . cognitionibus Augusti."

It cannot be my task to collect together the whole gigantic mass of material in even approximate completeness; I can only offer a selection of characteristic parallelisms. Those versed in the subject will agree with me that it is not always possible in such cases to distinguish between the Imperial cult and the Imperial law; the Imperial cult was in fact a portion of the law of the constitution.

The work, already referred to,¹ of David Magie on the official formulae of the Imperial age is of great help here. It does not, however, in the least exhaust the epigraphical and papyrological material; by far the larger number of my examples are derived from my own reading of the texts.

I begin with the family of ideas which groups itself round the word θεός, "God." There can be no question of any kind of Christian borrowings from the language of the Imperial cult, because both the cult of Christ and the cult of the emperor derive their divine predicates from the treasure-house of the past. But the words compounded with or derived from "God" in the Imperial cult were the most likely to arouse the sensation of contrast; they were known to every plain Christian man by reason of their frequent occurrence, and their lack of all ambiguity brought even the very simplest souls, in fact the very simplest souls rather than others, into the most painful conscientious difficulties. Even St. Paul declared one of the signs of Antichrist to be that he would proclaim himself as God.² We may leave to themselves all the minuter side-issues, e.g. the date when the divine titles were first bestowed on the living sovereign. As we are specially concerned with what the Primitive Christians felt, we need only point out that the problem of this contrast is older than the Imperial period. Under the successors of Alexander, who handed on to the Empire ready-made all the essential forms used in the adoration of the sovereign, exactly the same problem confronted the pious Jew into whose hands fell, let us say, the coins of the Seleucidae¹ with the legend "God" upon them applied to the kings. The Imperial age strengthened the feeling of contrast, since all the titles formerly bestowed on the various smaller rulers were now concentrated on one great ruler, and the conjecture made above² that the apocalyptic number 616 means "Caesar God"³ appears in this connexion fairly obvious.

A few examples will show with what force those titles must have struck upon a monotheistic conscience. In an official inscription⁴ the town council of Ephesus, in conjunction with other Greek cities of Asia, spoke of Julius Caesar, who was then Dictator, as "the God made manifest, off-

I have already treated of the title $\theta\epsilon\omicron\upsilon \nu\acute{\iota}\omicron\varsigma$, "son of God," in another place.¹ I remember discussing with a librarian friend of mine the fact that in many inscriptions and papyri of the Greek East Augustus² is called "the son of a god." My friend, a classical scholar, smiled benignly and said there could be no significance in that, "for" it was a translation of the Latin divi filius. I do not think that a Christian out of one of St. Paul's churches would have smiled at the expression or have considered it non-significant.³ St. Paul's preaching of the "son of God" had so quickened his religious feelings that he was bound to protest against the adornment of any other with the sacred formula. New individual quotations are unnecessary here; I give, again for ocular demonstration, only two inscriptions. Five fragments of a marble pedestal from Pergamum⁴ (Figure 53) bear this inscription, which was put up in honour of Augustus while he was still alive:—

[Αὐτοκράτ]ορ[a K]αῖσαπα [θ]εοῦ νῖδὸν θεὸν Σεβαστὸ[ν]
[πάσης] γῆ[ς κ]αὶ θ[α]λάσσης [ἐ]π[όπ]ιτ[ην]

Friedrich Pfister, Südwestdeutsche Schulblätter, 25 (1908) p. 345 f., tries to account for the legend that Augustus dedicated an altar to Christ the Son of God by supposing that a votive inscription dedicated to the Emperor as "the son of a god" was misinterpreted.

“Overseer” as a title of honour in this inscription recalls the use of the same word as a predicate of God in Judaism and Primitive Christianity.¹

Then an example of St. Paul’s time—a votive inscription for Nero on a marble slab at Magnesia on the Maeander² (Figure 54), between his adoption by Claudius and his accession to the throne (50 and 54 A.D.). Nero is called (line 3 ff.) “Son of the greatest of the gods, Tiberius Claudius,” etc.³

The adjective θεῖος, “divine,” belonging to the same family-group of meanings, is, like the Latin divinus, very common⁴ in the sense of “Imperial” throughout the whole Imperial period. So firmly had it established itself in the language of the court that it is found even in the period when Christianity was the religion of the State—a period far removed from the Primitive Christian standard of conscience. I will give but one example from the earliest, and a few from the later and latest period.⁵ The calendar inscription of Priene (Figure 59), about 9 B.C., speaks of the birthday of Augustus “the most divine Caesar.”⁶ The usage continues through the centuries, e.g. in the phrases⁷ “divine commandments,” “divine writings,” “divine grace.” In the third volume of *Greek Papyri in the British Museum*⁸ we have no less than ten documents in which Christian emperors are called "our most divine Lord"¹—Justinian twice, 558 and 561 A.D.; Justin II. four times, 567, 568, 571, 576; Tiberius II. twice, 582; Maurice once, 583; Heraclius once, 633 A.D. Similarly we find θειότης, "divinity," used of the (Christian) Emperor's majesty,² this also, of course, being taken over from the old language of religious observance.

In this connexion some light is perhaps thrown on the old title θεολόγος, "the theologian," bestowed on the author of the Apocalypse. The well-known explanation, that he was so called because he taught the divinity of the Logos, is so obviously a little discovery of later doctrinaires, that it does not merit serious discussion. The title is much more likely to have been borrowed from the Imperial cult. The theologi, of whom there were organised associations, were quite well-known dignitaries in the Imperial cult of Asia Minor, against which the Apocalypse protests so strongly. I have given the quotations elsewhere,³ and it is significant that the examples come from the very cities mentioned in the Apocalypse, Pergamum, Smyrna, Ephesus. When we further consider that these "theologians," whom we may probably regard as the official special preachers in connexion with the Imperial cult in Asia Minor, were often *Hymnodi*⁴ at the same time, the borrowing of the title becomes all the more intelligible. John the Theologian, the herald¹ of the true and *only*² God, is at the same time His great Hymnodus, leader of the choir of those who sing "a new ode"³ and "the ode of Moses, the slave of God, and the ode of the Lamb."⁴

Most important of all is the early establishment of a polemical parallelism between the cult of Christ and the cult of Caesar in the application of the term κύριος, "lord." The new texts have here furnished quite astonishing revelations.⁵

It was previously known that Augustus and Tiberius had scorned the title of "lord," because it directly contradicted the Roman conception of the empire as a "principate." "Lord" is a term instinct with Oriental feeling; the kings of the East have from time immemorial been "lords," and their subjects nothing better than slaves.

The same conception runs through the Oriental religions, which delight to express the relation of the divinity to the worshipper as that of the "lord," from Braunsberg, 25 November, 1908, refers me to his book Ps.-Dionysius in seinen Beziehungen zum Neuplatonismus und Mysterienwesen, 1900, pp. 38-49.

² In Rev. xv. 4 the word "only" has been inserted by John in the Old Testament quotation.

or, as we saw in the inscription of the beggar-priest of the Syrian goddess from Kefr-Hauar,¹ of the "lady" to the slave. In religious history the most important illustration of this is undoubtedly the Old Testament, especially in the Greek Septuagint translation, which, following Jewish custom, has even replaced the divine name Jahveh by "Lord."²

But we find "lord" or "lady" as divine names³ extending also into a number of cults of the Graeco-Roman world. "The lord Serapis," to take but one example, encountered us in the letters of Apion, the soldier,⁴ and the prodigal son Antonis Longus.⁵ It may be said with certainty that at the time when Christianity originated "Lord" was a divine predicate intelligible to the whole Eastern world. St. Paul's confession of "Our Lord Jesus Christ"—his cosmopolitan expansion of an Aramaic title⁶ for Jesus the Messiah, employed by the Primitive Christians and occasionally even by himself in the world—was, like the complemental thought, that the worshippers are the "slaves"⁷ of the Lord, understood in its full meaning by everybody in the Hellenistic East, and the adoption of the Christian terms of worship was vastly facilitated in consequence. This becomes still clearer if we compare, for instance, St. Paul's expression "the table of the Lord (Jesus Christ)," 1 Cor. x. 21, with the analogous Egyptian expression,¹ "the table of the lord Serapis," which has been discovered in the papyri.²

This is no doubt a case of independent parallelism. St. Paul's expression was most probably influenced by such passages as Malachi i. 7, 12, and Ezekiel xxxix. 20, xlv. 16 in the Greek Old Testament. Another Pauline phrase, "the table of devils" (1 Cor. x. 21), seems to be connected with Isaiah lxx. 11, Septuagint version. It is of course chronologically possible, but not at all probable, that the Serapis formula was influenced by the Christian one. All that can be said at present is that the two formulae are found side by side, and that no genealogical connexion is perceivable. The Egyptian analogy shows that in yet another vital point the language of ancient Christianity was approached by a usage of ancient paganism. St. Paul himself, wishing to make the Corinthians realise the nature of the Lord's Supper, alluded to the analogy of the sacred feasts of the pagans (1 Cor. x. 19-21).

Now it has generally been assumed hitherto that the Roman emperors were first named "lord" or "our lord" from Domitian onward, i.e. not until after St. Paul's time. That may be true of Rome and the West. In the East, however, as the records now show, the ancient title, which had long been in use in the language of the native courts, and had moreover an essential touch of the religious about it, was bestowed on the emperors much earlier. The subsequent victory of the "Dominate" over the "Principate"¹—ultimately a victory of Oriental over Roman feeling—was thus foretold centuries in advance.

Here too Hellenistic culture paved the way,² at least in Egypt. As it had been usual to address the Pharaoh with "O king, our lord,"³ so a Munich Papyrus gives as one of the official titles of King Ptolemy IV. Philopator (221–205 B.C.), translated into Greek, "lord of the diadems"⁴; and the Rosetta Stone⁵ attaches the same title to Ptolemy V. Epiphanes (205–181 B.C.). Still more remarkable is it, however, when on 12 May 62 B.C. a high Egyptian official in an inscription on the door of the temple of Isis on the island of Philae calls Ptolemy XIII. "the lord king god,"⁶ or when in an inscription from Alexandria of the year 52 B.C. the co-regents with this king (Ptolemy XIV. and Cleopatra) are called "the lords, the most great gods."⁷ It cannot, therefore, have sounded foreign to Egyptian ears when the Egyptian translators of the Old Testament into Greek rendered quite literally⁸ the Semitic "Lord King" which occurs not unfrequently in the original. Semitic and Egyptian here coincided, and when we find the same title applied to the Herods in Greek inscriptions¹ of Palestine (and other places), that is only another instance of the parallelism already insisted on between Egyptian and Palestinian culture.

It is therefore in accordance with Egyptian or Egypto-Semitic custom that in numerous Greek inscriptions, papyri, and ostraca of the earliest Imperial period the title "lord" is attached to the Caesars by Egyptians and Syrians. An inscription from Abila in Syria, which afterwards names "the lord Cronos," speaks of "the lords Augusti,"² by which perhaps Tiberius and his mother Livia are meant.³ There is literary record that Caligula allowed himself to be called "lord."⁴ An Egyptian document⁵ of the year 49 and an ostrakon⁶ from Thebes of the year 54 call Claudius "the lord."

For Nero "the lord," i.e. in the time of the most important of St. Paul's letters, the number of examples suddenly rushes up tremendously. Wilcken's book alone contains 27 ostraca dated after Nero "the lord," among them the one of 4 August 63 which is facsimiled above.⁷ My own collection also contains some yet unpublished Neronian Kyrios-ostraca. We find the title "lord" applied to Nero also in papyrus documents, of which a good example is the letter of Harmiysis, 24 July 66, of which a picture is given above¹ (Figure 21). The officials who sign the document use the title three times. It is a very important fact that under Nero we first find the Kyrios-title in an inscription in Greece. The marble tablet of Acraephiae in Boeotia² which has yielded such an extraordinarily rich harvest, and which immortalises, among other things, a speech made by Nero at Corinth in November 67, contains a decree of honour in which the Boeotian town calls him once "lord of the whole world," and then, what is in my opinion more important, simply "the lord Augustus," divine honours being awarded him by the decree. This important inscription shows how far the East had already penetrated on its march of conquest into the West. A living illustration of the inscription and the forebodings it arouses is supplied by the journey undertaken a year before (66 A.D.) by the Persian king Tiridates to do homage to the Emperor. Tiridates came from the East to Italy and did homage to Nero at Naples as "the lord" and in Rome as "the god."³

The fact that a New Testament writer⁴ well acquainted with this period makes Festus the Procurator speak of Nero simply as "the lord," now acquires its full significance in this connexion. The insignificant detail, questioned by various commentators, who, seated at their writing-tables in Tübingen or Berlin, vainly imagined that they knew the period better than St. Luke, now appears thoroughly credible.

⁴ St. Luke, Acts xxv. 26.

Further examples of the Kyrios-title down to Domitian could be easily given, especially from the ostraca,¹ but they are not necessary. It is sufficient for our purpose to have realised the state of affairs in the time of Nero and St. Paul. And then we cannot escape the conjecture that the Christians of the East who heard St. Paul preach in the style of Phil. ii. 9, 11 and 1 Cor. viii. 5, 6 must have found in the solemn confession² that Jesus Christ is "the Lord" a silent protest against other "lords," and against "the lord," as people were beginning to call the Roman Caesar. And St. Paul himself must have felt and intended this silent protest,—as well as Jude, when he calls Jesus Christ "our only master and Lord."³

Not many years later, soon after the destruction of Jerusalem, Jewish rebels in Egypt, so Josephus⁴ tells us (doubly credible when one knows the Egyptian use of the title "lord" at this time), refused to call the Caesar "lord," because they "held God alone to be the Lord,"—and died as martyrs, men and boys. Though the grief and resentment of these desperate ones did not burn in those who loved Jerusalem before the catastrophe of the year 70, yet St. Paul and his friends were one with them in the religious protest against the deification of the Caesar. And a hundred years later the Christian exclusive confession of "our Lord Jesus Christ," which could not but sound politically dangerous to a Roman official (from Domitian onwards "our lord" is found applied to the Caesars),¹ led to Christian martyrdoms. In the case of Polycarp, at Smyrna in the year 155, it was a question of the "lord"-formula. "What is the harm in saying 'lord Caesar'?" the Irenarch Herod and his father Nicetes asked the saint seductively.² The scene enacted on 17 July 180 at Carthage before the judgment-seat of the Proconsul P. Vigellius Saturninus stands out even more plainly.³ The Roman official commands the Christian Speratus of Scili (Scilli) in Numidia⁴: "Swear by the genius of our lord the Emperor!" And the Christian answers: "I know no imperium of this world, . . . I know my Lord, the King of kings, and Emperor of all nations."⁵

That the old polemical parallelism was felt even after Christianity became the state religion, is shown perhaps by the fact that the Christian emperors, though they did not drop the title of "lord," often chose another Greek word instead. In Greek titles of Christian emperors in the papyri the word Kyrios is conspicuously eclipsed by the title Despotes (which occurs towards the end of the 3rd cent.⁶), as though Kyrios was intended to be reserved for the heavenly Lord.

The Church of England prays "through Jesus Christ our Lord" for "our most gracious Sovereign Lord" the King, and there is no offence in the collocation, but few users of the prayer ever dream of what lies behind those words—that there were times in which the most earnest among Christians went to execution rather than transfer to a man the divine title of their Saviour.

Still more strikingly than with the substantive, the parallelism between the language of Christianity and the official vocabulary of Imperial law shows itself in the use of the adjective κυριακός, "belonging to the Lord," "Lord's." Familiar to every reader of the New Testament from 1 Cor. xi. 20 and Rev. i. 10, where it occurs in the phrases "the Lord's supper" and "the Lord's day" (i.e. probably¹ Sunday), it may certainly be described as a very characteristic word of the early language of Christian worship, and it was formerly considered as a specifically Biblical and ecclesiastical word, some even going so far as to regard it as a coinage of St. Paul's. But as a matter of fact St. Paul took it from the language of contemporary constitutional law, in which it meant "Imperial." I have shown elsewhere² on the authority of papyri and inscriptions that the word was common in Egypt and Asia Minor during the Imperial period in certain definite phrases, e.g. "the lord's treasury" = imperial treasury, "the lord's service" = imperial service, and I could now perhaps quadruple the number of examples from the 2nd cent. A.D. onwards.

Instead of doing so here, I will only show a picture (Figure 55) of the inscription containing the oldest example yet known of the official use of the word in the Imperial period. It is an edict of the Praefect of Egypt, Ti. Julius Alexander, 6 July, 68 A.D., inscribed on the wall of the propylon of a temple at El-Khargeh in the Great Oasis.¹

In this edict the high Roman official, who was also a Jew like St. Paul, uses the word κυριακός twice. In line 13 he speaks of the "imperial finances,"² and in line 18 of the "imperial treasury."³ In their bearing on the methods of research these passages are extremely instructive. Scholars who only believe in the borrowing of secular words for purposes of the Christian religion when they are shown pre-Christian quotations,⁴ will hardly wish to assert here that the Praefect of Egypt had borrowed the remarkable word which he uses a few years later than St. Paul from Christianity and introduced it into his own vocabulary of constitutional law. It is much more likely to be the case that the presumably older Hellenistic (perhaps Egypto-Hellenistic)⁵ word κυριακός was in use as a technical

In line 3 of the same inscription the Strategus of the Great Oasis, Julius Demetrius, who had to publish the Praefect's edict, distinguishes the day of publication (1 Phaophi = 28 September, 68 A.D.) by a name which must also be noted in this connexion, viz. Julia Sebaste.¹ This name for a day, shortened to Sebaste, occurs very frequently in the Imperial period, both in Egypt and in Asia Minor. It was first made known to us by the new texts, and although the problems it raises are not all solved yet, it may be said with certainty that it means something like "Emperor's Day"; that is to say, a certain day² of the month received the name Sebaste in honour of the Emperor. On collecting the examples known to me some time ago,³ I said that this name, formed probably after some Hellenistic model,⁴ was analogous to the Primitive Christian "Lord's Day" as a name for Sunday.⁵ But the more I regard this detail in connexion with the great subject of "Christ and the Caesars," the more I am bound to reckon with the possibility that the distinctive title "Lord's Day" may have been connected with conscious feelings of protest against the cult of the Emperor with its "Emperor's Day."

The "Sebaste Day," although never mentioned in literature, cannot have been a passing fancy of the "adulators."¹ The ostraca show it as an Eastern institution familiar even to the lower orders in the period which saw the birth of Christianity. Wilcken² was able to refer to seven ostraca, ranging from 15 to 44 A.D., which are dated by the Sebaste Day. My own collection contains an eighth example, from Thebes, end of August or September 33 A.D. (Figure 56), which Wilcken has deciphered for me. As a document from the hand of a simple money-changer it may serve to supplement the high official's inscription in the Oasis:—

further levy of $1\frac{1}{2}$ obols.¹ In the year 20 of Tiberius Caesar Sebastos, in the month Sebastos, on Sebaste Day.² Petemē(nophis), the son of Picos.³

I have already hinted that these examples from Egypt are not isolated. Here, as so often, corresponding examples from Asia Minor⁴ prove the unity of the culture on the eastern and southern shores of the Mediterranean. To illustrate the uniformity I give here (Figures 57 and 58) two portions of the inscription at Pergamum, of the reign of Hadrian,⁵ which has been mentioned already in connexion with the hymnodi. The name Sebaste is here assumed to be so well known that it is not written out in full but abbreviated in three places (B. 4, 8; D. 10) as $\Sigma\epsilon\beta$ or $\overline{\Sigma\epsilon\beta}$.

In these three passages where the Sebaste Day is mentioned in the inscription the reference is to money payments of a religious nature which two officials, the Eukosmos and the Grammatus, of the association of hymnodi have each to make on this day. Money payments due on Sebaste Day are heard of again on an inscription at Iasus,⁶ and all the ostraca that mention the Sebaste Day are receipts for money. Were then the Sebaste Days, I would ask, favourite days for effecting payments in the Hellenistic East? And I would further ask, with all caution: When St. Paul advised the Christians of Galatia and Corinth¹ to raise their contributions to the collection for the saints by instalments payable every Sunday, was he thinking of some such custom then prevalent in the world around him? The question is at least justifiable. For my own part I hesitate to return an affirmative answer, because it seems to me more probable to assume that St. Paul's advice was connected with some system of wage-paying (of which, however, I know nothing) that may have been customary in the Imperial period.

If at the pregnant words "God" and "Lord" all manner of sensations of protest were roused in the Christian worshipper against the cult of the Caesar, this was of course also the case with the still more impressive combination κύριος καὶ θεός, "Lord and God," which, as the confession of St. Thomas,² is one of the culminating points (originally the climax and concluding point) of the Gospel of St. John. In Christian worship it was probably a direct suggestion from the Septuagint.³ It probably made its way into the Imperial cult from Mediterranean cults: an inscription at Socnopaei Nesus in the Fayûm, 17 March 24 B.C., already cited,⁴ mentions a building dedicated "to the god and lord Socnopaeus," and an inscription of the Imperial period at Thala in the Province of Africa⁵ is consecrated to "the god lord Saturnus." Under Domitian (i.e., in New Testament terms, in the Johannine period) we have the first example in the cult of the Caesars.

Domitian himself arranges to be called "our lord and god."¹ In the third century the phrase becomes quite official, but its use had continued meanwhile in the East, as shown by an inscription from the Tauric Chersonese² in which the Emperor Antoninus Pius is called "our god and lord."

A whole chain of sensations of contrast and protest is dependent on the central thought in Primitive Christian worship, that Jesus is the βασιλεύς, the "King." In the Hellenistic East, which received its stamp from the post-Alexandrian kings, the title "king" had remained very popular,³ and was even transferred to the Roman Emperor, as we see for example in the New Testament.⁴ It has been well shown by Weinel⁵ that in the age of the Revelation of St. John to confess the kingdom of Jesus was to set vibrating a tense polemical feeling against the Caesars. The clearest example is perhaps the apocalyptic formula⁶ "Lord of Lords and King of Kings." The title "king of kings"⁷ was originally in very early Eastern history a decoration of actual great monarchs and also a divine¹ title, especially well known as applied to the Achaemenidae in Persia. It was suggested to the Christians not only because it was attached to God in the Greek Bible,² but also because according to the evidence of coins and inscriptions it was actually borne at the period in question by princes of Armenia,³ the Bosphoran kingdom,⁴ and Palmyra.⁵

It would be possible in the case of many individual words⁶ belonging to the retinue of "king" to prove the parallelism between the language of Christian worship and the formulae of the Imperial law and the Imperial cult. But I wish only to emphasise the characteristic main lines and accordingly dispense with details.

In the case of the word σωτήρ, "Saviour," the parallelism is particularly clear. I will simply refer to the splendid articles by Harnack⁷ and Wendland,⁸ and call attention to one special point. The ample materials collected by Magie¹ show that the full title of honour, "Saviour of the world," with which St. John² adorns the Master, was bestowed with sundry variations in the Greek expression³ on Julius Caesar, Augustus, Claudius, Vespasian, Titus, Trajan, Hadrian, and other Emperors in inscriptions of the Hellenistic East.⁴ The exact Johannine term² is specially common in inscriptions for Hadrian,⁵ and it is only what might be expected from the parallelism between the cult of Christ and the cult of the Caesars when the adjective σωσικόσμιος,⁶ "world-saving, world-rescuing," found in the papyri, alluding to Hadrian's title of "saviour of the world," and perhaps invented in his honour, afterwards turns up many centuries later Christianised and in Christian use.⁷

The word ἀρχιερεύς, "high priest," to which the Epistle to the Hebrews gave currency as a worshipful term applied to Christ, shows how a cult-word that was certainly developed within Primitive Christianity from Jewish premises entered spontaneously into the usual parallelism as soon as it found itself in the world. It was by this Greek word, as numerous inscriptions¹ have shown, that the title pontifex maximus, borne by the Emperors, was translated in the East.

The parallelism exists not only with sacred titles, it goes further. Two examples are now forthcoming to prove that the word εὐαγγέλιον, "gospel, good tidings," which was in use in pre-Christian times in the profane sense of good news, and which then became a Primitive Christian cult-word of the first order, was also employed in sacral use in the Imperial cult. One of the examples is that calendar inscription of Priene, about 9 B.C., which we have mentioned² twice already, and which is now in the Berlin Museum. Discovered by German archaeologists on two stones of different kind in the north hall of the market-place at Priene, and published for the first time by Theodor Mommsen and Ulrich von Wilamowitz-Moellendorff with other allied texts and a commentary,³ this inscription, designed to introduce the Asian calendar, has already been appreciated by Adolf Harnack⁴ and Paul Wendland⁵ as of great importance in the history of the sacred language of Asia Minor. Harnack translated the most important parts into German.⁶ H. Winnefeld kindly obtained for me a photograph of lines 1-60; from which, with the consent of the Directors of the Royal Museums, our Figures 59 and 60 have been made, their size being less than one-quarter of the original. facsimiles to be published of these important texts.¹ Here we find (line 40 f., Figure 60) this remarkable sentence referring to the birthday of the Emperor Augustus :—

| ἡρξεν δὲ τῷ κόσμῳ τῶν δι' αὐτὸν εὐαγγελί[ων ἡ γε- νέθλιος] τοῦ θεοῦ. | But the birthday of the god was for the world the beginning of tidings of joy on his account.² |
|---|--|

Two and a half centuries later we hear the echo of these festal trumpets when, on the receipt of the “joyful tidings” that G. Julius Verus Maximus had been appointed Caesar, an Egyptian, probably a high official, wrote to another a letter, preserved on a fragment of papyrus in the Royal Library at Berlin,³ calling for a procession to be arranged for the gods. The fragment reads :—

| ἐπεὶ γν[ώ]στ[ης ἐγενόμην τοῦ] εὐαγγελί[ο]ν⁴ περὶ τοῦ ἀνη- γορεῦσθαι Καίσαρα τὸν τοῦ θεοφιλεστάτου κυρίου 5 ἡμῶν Αὐτοκράτορος Καί- σαρως Γαίου Ἰουλίου Οὐήρου Μαξιμίνου | Forasmuch as I have become aware of the tidings of joy concerning the proclaiming as Emperor of Gaius Julius Verus Maximus Augustus, the son of our lord, most dear to the gods, the Emperor Caesar |

³ Published by G. Parthey, Memorie dell' Istituto di Corrispondenza Archeologica, 2, Lipsia, 1865, p. 440. Ulrich Wilcken revised the text some years ago, and very kindly supplied me with his readings, which I have adopted here (letter, Leipzig, 4 October, 1907).

⁴ Lines 1 and 2 are so restored by me. Parthey read γν[ω]στ after ἐπει; when Wilcken re-examined the fragment these letters were no longer there. For γνώστης cf. Acts xxvi. 3. A possible reading would be ἐπεὶ γν[ω]στ[εία ἐγένετο τοῦ], “now that confirmation has come of the good news”; for γνωστεία cf. Fayûm Towns and their Papyri, No. 65, (2nd cent. A.D.).—The first word of the second line was wrongly read by Parthey εὐαγγέλθαι. To judge whether the restoration εὐαγγελί[ο]ν, suggested by Wilcken's reading εὐαγγέλ . . ν, is right, the papyrus must be re-examined. There is nothing else that could very well be intended.

Yet another of the central ideas of the oldest Christian worship receives light from the new texts,¹ viz. παρουσία, “advent, coming,”² a word expressive of the most ardent hopes of a St. Paul. We now may say that the best interpretation of the Primitive Christian hope of the Parusia is the old Advent text,³ “Behold, thy King cometh unto thee.” From the Ptolemaic period down into the 2nd cent. A.D. we are able to trace the word in the East as a technical expression for the arrival or the visit of the king or the emperor.⁴ The parusia of the sovereign must have been something well known even to the people, as shown by the facts that special payments in kind and taxes to defray the cost of the parusia were exacted, that in Greece a new era was reckoned from the parusia of the Emperor Hadrian, that all over the world advent-coins were struck after a parusia of the emperor, and that we are even able to quote examples of advent-sacrifices.⁵

The subject of parusia dues and taxes in Egypt has been treated in detail by Wilcken.⁶ The oldest passage he mentions is in the Flinders Petrie Papyrus II. 39 e, of the 3rd cent. B.C., where, according to his ingenious interpretation, contributions are noted for a crown of gold to be presented to the king at his parusia.¹ This papyrus supplies an exceptionally fine background of contrast to the figurative language of St. Paul, in which Parusia (or Epiphany, “appearing”) and *crown*² occur in collocation. While the sovereigns of this world expect at their parusia a costly crown for themselves, “at the parusia of our Lord Jesus” the apostle will wear a crown—the “crown of glory” (1 Thess. ii. 19) won by his work among the churches, or the “crown of righteousness” which the Lord will give to him and to all them that have loved His appearing (2 Tim. iv. 8).

I have found another characteristic example in a petition,³ circa 113 B.C., which was found among the wrappings of the mummy of a sacred crocodile. A parusia of King Ptolemy, the second who called himself Soter (“saviour”), is expected, and for this occasion a great requisition has been issued for corn, which is being collected at Cerceosiris by the village headman and the elders of the peasants.⁴ Speaking of this and another delivery of corn, these officials say :—

... καὶ προσεδρεύοντων διὰ
τε νυκτὸς καὶ ἡμέρας μέχρι τοῦ τὸ προκείμενον ἐκπληρῶ-σαι καὶ τὴν ἐπιγεγραμμένην πρὸς τὴν τοῦ βασιλέως παρουσίαν ὡγορὰν π . . .

... and applying ourselves

⁴ πρεσβυτέρων τῶν γεω(ργῶν). This is a new quotation to show the age of the title “presbyter,” cf. Bibelstudien, p. 153 f.; Neue Bibelstudien, p. 60 ff.; Bible Studies, pp. 154 f., 233 f.

Are not these Egyptian peasants, toiling day and night in expectation of the parusia of their saviour king, an admirable illustration of our Lord's words (Luke xviii. 7) about the elect who cry day and night to God, in expectation of the coming of the Son of Man (Luke xviii. 8)?

Again among the Tebtunis Papyri¹ there is a bill, from the end of the 2nd cent. B.C., which mentions "the parusia of the king," while an ostrakon² of the 2nd cent. B.C., from Thebes, reckons the expenses of the "parusia of the queen."

As in Egypt, so also in Asia: the uniformity of Hellenistic civilisation is proved once more in this instance. An inscription of the 3rd cent. B.C. at Olbia³ mentions a parusia of King Saitapharnes, the expenses of which were a source of grave anxiety to the city fathers, until a rich citizen, named Protogenes, paid the sum—900 pieces of gold, which were presented to the king. Next comes an example of great importance as proving an undoubted sacral use of the word, viz. an inscription of the 3rd. cent. B.C., recording a cure at the temple of Asclepius at Epidaurus,⁴ which mentions a parusia of the healer (saviour) god Asclepius. Other examples of Hellenistic age known to me are a passage in Polybius⁵ referring to a parusia of King Antiochus the Great, and two letters of King

Mithradates VI. Eupator of Pontus at the beginning of his first war with the Romans, 88 B.C., recorded in an inscription at Nysa in Caria.¹ The prince, writing to Leonippus the Praefect of Caria, makes twofold mention of his own parusia, i.e. his invasion of the province of Asia.²

It is the legitimate continuation of the Hellenistic usage that in the Imperial period the parusia of the sovereign should shed a special brilliance. Even the visit of a scion of the Imperial house, G. Caesar († 4 A.D.), a grandson of Augustus, was, as we know from an inscription,³ made the beginning of a new era in Cos. In memory of the visit of the Emperor Nero,⁴ in whose reign St. Paul wrote his letters to Corinth, the cities of Corinth and Patras struck advent-coins.⁵ Adventus Aug(usti) Cor(inthi) is the legend on one, Adventus Augusti on the other. Here we have corresponding to the Greek parusia the Latin word advent, which the Latin Christians afterwards simply took over, and which is to-day familiar to every child among us. How graphically it must have appealed to the Christians of Thessalonica, with their living conception of the parusiae of the rulers of this world, when they read in St. Paul's second letter⁶ of the Satanic "parusia "

A whole host of advent-coins resulted from the numerous journeyings of the Emperor Hadrian; we have specimens,¹ I suppose, from most of the Imperial provinces, and these, it may be remarked, were official coinages of the Empire.² The arrival of Hadrian at Rome on 9 July, 118, was even celebrated by the Arval brothers with solemn sacrifices in the Emperor's presence, to which the inscriptions containing the Acts of their college bear record.³ The parallelism between the Hellenistic and the Imperial period is seen also in the fact that the expenses attending a parusia of the sovereign were considerable.⁴ How deeply a parusia stamped itself on the memory is shown by the eras that were reckoned from parusiae. We have heard already of an era at Cos dating from the epiphany of G. Caesar,⁵ and we find that in Greece a new era was begun⁶ with the first visit of the Emperor Hadrian in the year 124;—the magnificent monuments in memory of that parusia still meet the eye at Athens⁷ and Eleusis. There is something peculiarly touching in the fact that towards the end of the 2nd century, at the very time when the Christians were beginning

To make the circle of Hellenism complete once more, this inscription from Arcadia gives us again the word parusia, which we found in Egypt, Asia Minor, and the New Testament. In Greece, however, a synonym is more usual.³

Even in early Christian times the parallelism between the parusia of the representative of the State and the parusia of Christ was clearly felt by the Christians themselves. This is shown by a newly discovered⁴ petition of the small proprietors of the village of Aphrodite in Egypt to the Dux of the Thebaid in the year 537–538 A.D.,⁵ a papyrus which at the same time is an interesting memorial of Christian popular religion in the age of Justinian.

"It is a subject of prayer with us night and day, to be held worthy of your welcome parusia."⁶

“as they watch eagerly from Hades for the future parusia of Christ the everlasting God.”¹

Quite closely related to parusia is another cult-word, ἐπιφάνεια, “epiphany,” “appearing.” How closely the two ideas were connected in the age of the New Testament is shown by the passage in 2 Thess. ii. 8, already quoted, and by the associated usage of the Pastoral Epistles, in which “epiphany” or “appearing” nearly always means the future parusia of Christ,² though once³ it is the parusia which patristic writers afterwards called “the first.” Equally clear, however, is the witness of an advent-coin struck by Actium-Nicopolis for Hadrian, with the legend “Epiphany of Augustus”⁴; the Greek word coincides with the Latin word “advent” generally used on coins. The history of this word “epiphany” goes back into the Hellenistic period, but I will merely point out the fact, without illustration: the observation is not new, but the new proofs available are very abundant.⁵

The same parallelism that we have hitherto been observing is found again in the names applied to persons standing in the relation of servants to Christ and the Caesars, and in other similar points. The proud words of St. Paul, "We are ambassadors for Christ" (2 Cor. v. 20 ; cf. Eph. vi. 20), stand out in quite different relief when we know that πρεσβεύω, "I am an ambassador," and the corresponding substantive πρεσβευτής, "ambassador," were the proper terms in the Greek East for the Emperor's Legate.¹

In the same way πεπίστευμαι, "I am entrusted (with an office, with the gospel)," which is repeatedly² used by St. Paul, recalls the Greek name (known from literary sources) of the Imperial secretary for Greek correspondence,³ especially when we remember the beautiful figure in 2 Cor. iii. 3, according to which St. Paul has a letter to write for Christ.⁴ This characteristic expression includes a parallel to the technical term "letter of Augustus," i.e. Imperial letter, which is found in an inscription of the Imperial period at Ancyra.⁵ The seven letters of Christ in the Revelation to Ephesus, Smyrna, Pergamum, Thyatira, Sardis, Philadelphia, and Laodicea, which as regards their form must be reckoned with the letters from heaven,⁶ find a background in the social history of the time in the numerous Imperial letters to cities of Asia Minor or to corporations in those cities, which were immediately published in the form of inscriptions, and so became known to everybody. To mention only addresses that occur in the Apocalypse, we possess at the present day in inscriptions larger or smaller fragments of at least six Ephesus letters,¹ three Smyrna letters,² at least seven Pergamum letters,³ and perhaps one Sardis letter,⁴ from Roman Emperors. The introductory formula in those letters of Christ—the solemn “Thus saith”⁵—comes most assuredly from an Oriental (Old Testament) usage, but it is certainly not without interest to find at least “Saith”⁶ as the formula at the beginning of Imperial letters already of the first century.

Philo, Josephus,⁷ and 2 Tim. iii. 15 have made us familiar with the name ἱερὰ γράμματα, “sacred writings,” “holy scripture,” as a title of dignity for the Old Testament. The parallelism between letters of Christ and letters of the Emperor becomes still clearer when we find the same term in technical use in the East⁸ for Imperial letters and decrees. In pre-Christian inscriptions it often⁹ means the “hieroglyphs.” But an inscription from Nysa in Caria of the time of Augustus¹⁰ uses it probably of an Imperial¹¹ decree; and this is certainly the case with an inscription from Aezani in Phrygia of the time of Hadrian,¹ an unpublished inscription of the Imperial period at Athens,² and a bilingual inscription at Paros,³ 204 A.D., which translates the Greek term in Latin as sacra[e litt]erae. The Latin Vulgate employs exactly the same phrase in rendering 2 Tim. iii. 15! The phrase θεῖα γράμματα, “divine writings” (used of the Bible by patristic writers), is applied quite synonymously to letters of the Emperor in an inscription from Tyras on the Dniester, 17 February 201 A.D.,⁴ and an inscription from Scaptopare in Bulgaria, 238 A.D.⁵ The latter refers to Imperial ordinances as “divine commandments,”⁶ which resembles the New Testament term “God’s commandments.”⁷

In this connexion attention may once more be called to the Primitive Christian’s designation of himself as δοῦλος Χριστοῦ, “slave of Christ,” which we have already⁸ looked at against another background. Though not designed originally as a formula of contrast to the cult of the Caesar, it certainly aroused sensations of contrast when heard beside the frequent title of “slave of the Emperor”:—there were Imperial slaves all over the world. One example out of many is an inscription⁹ from Dorylaeum in Phrygia,

Imperial period, which mentions "Agathopus, slave of the lord Emperor."

The same order of parallelism obtains between the genitive Χριστοῦ, "belonging to Christ" (Gal. iii. 29, v. 24; 1 Cor. i. 12, iii. 23, xv. 23; 2 Cor. x. 7), and the simple genitive Καίσαρος, "belonging to the Emperor." The latter, first revealed by the new texts, goes back to the Latin elliptic Caesaris, and can be established for Egypt by several papyri of the reign of Augustus and by inscriptions of the reign of Hadrian.¹ The analogy which has been already² claimed on linguistic grounds between the oldest name for the followers of Christ, Χριστιανός, "Christian," and Καισαριανός, "Caesarian," "Imperial (slave),"³ receives in this connexion new and remarkable illustration.

Characteristic too is the parallel between St. Paul's phrase ἀπελεύθερος κυρίου, "freedman of the Lord" (1 Cor. vii. 22), and the frequent title "freedman of the Emperor." It appears, for instance, in a Latin inscription of the 2nd century at Cos⁴ (Figure 61), on the tombstone of the Imperial freedman Hermes, who had been an official of the inheritance-duties department. In the third and fourth lines he is called Augustor(um) n(ostrorum) lib(erto), "freedman of our Augusti." In Greek the title is also of frequent occurrence, with many variations,¹ from the first century A.D. onwards.

Finally, when Christ says in St. John's Gospel² (xv. 14 f.) :—

“Ye are My friends. . . . Henceforth I call you not slaves”—the collocation of “slave” and φίλος, “friend,” reminds us that the Emperor also had “friends,” as well as “slaves.” “Friend of the Emperor” is an official title,³ going back probably to the language of the court under the successors of Alexander,⁴ and found, for instance, in two inscriptions of the Imperial period at Thyatira.⁵ The parallelism becomes still clearer afterwards if we compare the adjectives φιλοκαῖσαρ and φιλοσέβαστος, “friend of the Emperor,” which are frequent⁶ in inscriptions, with the similarly formed word φιλόχριστος, “friend of Christ,” which is a favourite with patristic writers,⁷ or if we compare the extraordinary word σεβαστόγνωστος,⁸

10. Have the gold coins regained somewhat of their old clearness of definition? Looking back on the parallelism between the cult of Christ and the cult of Caesar, the lines of which might be yet further prolonged, we may say this: it is one of the historical characteristics of Primitive Christianity that it made religion a serious business. Its uncompromisingly *religious*² character, tolerating no concessions to irreligion, is never seen more clearly than when we try to realise the oppressive sensations of contrast that tortured the saints in Christ even in the days of Nero when confronted with the glittering formulae of the cult of the sovereign.

In fact one abiding result of every really close study of the religious records of the world contemporary with the New Testament is this: they quicken our sense of religion, especially of the simple, vigorous, popular forms of the religion which is seen at work in the gospel and in the earliest cult of Christ, and which is still a living force in the New Testament to-day. Our learned forefathers used most commonly to pursue a retrospective method in their study of the sacred volume, looking backward into the earliest ages of Christianity from the point of view of churchmen and theologians of their own day. They judged the primitive age accordingly; and the New Testament, containing the relics of that age, they conceived and made use of as the classical textbook of dogma and ethics. But if we approach our sacred Book from the very world that surrounded the New Testament, i.e. from the Imperial age and from the middle and lower classes of society, then with the same eyes that modern theological prejudices had previously blinded to religion, we shall see that the New Testament, really a sacred Book, is not a creature of theology, but of religion. The written memorials of the New Testament age quickened our sense of the characteristics of the popular language, and of the nature of things non-literary, and now they make clear to us the nature of things non-theological.

I speak of course of theology and things theological in the sense that we connect with the words nowadays. If we still felt and appreciated the ancient meaning of the word "theologus,"¹ we might unhesitatingly call the New Testament a theological book; for that would mean practically nothing more than that it was a prophetic and religious book. But that was certainly not the meaning of those scholars who laid stress on the theological character of the New Testament. They wanted to display its (in the main) didactic, considered, systematic contents. If religion is to us an inner life in God, theology is scientific consideration about religion and its historical effects. But the considered element in the New Testament falls very much behind the unconsidered naïveté of the purely religious, the prophetic, and the devotional. And though we may be inclined, in the atmosphere of our Western doctrinairism, to spread the grey nimbus of system over the New Testament, the sun of its Anatolian home affords us joyful glimpses of the breadth and depth of that divine strength grown human which streams immeasurable from the confessions in this Anatolian book. The mere paragraphs vanish ; personalities rise before us, heroes from the multitude of despised and forgotten ones : Elias is come again to prepare the way, then the Anointed of the Lord in His first parusia, and lastly His world-evangelist, St. Paul, and our other Apostolic Fathers.

Like John the Baptist, Jesus of Nazareth is altogether non-theological.¹ He is not a speculative doctrinaire. He is altogether religion, spirit, fire. It would be a mistake to speak of a theological system in the case of Jesus. He never thought out a paragraph, never penned a single tractate. He is so simple that the children cry out with joy at His approach, and the very poorest understand Him. Insignificant persons, unknown by name, who had no idea of the value of literal accuracy, handed on His "doctrine" in the homely garb of the popular language. Jesus thought nothing of the theology of His age: He even thanks His Father for having hidden His profoundest revelations from the wise and prudent. The lightnings of His prophetic scorn descend upon the theological authorities who paid tithe of mint, and anise, and cummin, but omitted mercy and faith. Contemplative theology, the offspring of doubt, was completely outside the sphere of His nature, because He was in daily personal intercourse with the higher world, and the living God was in Him. To this latter fact His confessions, His words of controversy, consolation, and reproof bear witness. It is impossible to unite all these sayings into the artistic mosaic of an evangelical system: they are the reflection of an inner life full of unbroken strength, full of purity, full of devotion to God and His human family.

Again Paul the Apostle, the other great figure that stands sharply outlined historically at the beginning of our religion, belongs, best part of him, to the age before theology.¹ It is true he is the disciple of a theological school, and as a Christian missionary he not unfrequently makes use of the traditional theological methods. But the tent-weaver of Tarsus must not for that reason be numbered with Origen, Thomas Aquinas, and Schleiermacher, but with the herdsman of Tekoa, the shoemaker of Görlitz, and the ribbon-weaver of Mülheim.² Are we really listening to the pulsations of his heart when we hear him interpret allegorically the story of Hagar and Sarah? Are we not infinitely nearer to his soul, his personality, the best that is in him, when we behold him on his knees, crushed, annihilated, and new-created by the grace of His God? His sentences concerning the Law—are they calm, pointed theses from a theological debate, or are they not rather confessions of a tortured and liberated soul? Is Paul the inventor of a dogma of Christ, or is he not rather the witness of the Christ experienced by him? Is to him the glory of the Living One a theory thought out in the study, or was it not rather flashed upon him in a sacred hour of revelation? Paul the theologian belongs to the history of Rabbinism: his interpretation of Scripture, in which his theology for the most part concentrates, is in no way original or historically distinctive. Paul the theologian vanishes beside Rabban Gamaliel and the other Tanaitic

² [The prophet Amos is fairly recognisable, but English readers may be reminded that Jakob Böhme, the mystic, 1575–1624, lived and died at Görlitz, Gerhard Tersteegen, the devotional writer, 1697–1769, at Mülheim. fathers.¹ It is not in the history of theology that Paul is a characteristic figure, but in the history of religion. And there his importance lies essentially in the fact that, being wholly un-rabbinic and wholly pre-dogmatic, he planted the living roots of religion in the spiritually present Person of the living Lord Jesus Christ. This he did, not by any new artifices of speculative theology, but by the power of his experience of Christ, from which faith streamed forth with triumphant strength of attraction. From the time of St. Paul there is, not Christology, but Christolatry, a Christianity of Christ. Paul is not like the many Christological speculators among us, who attain to the worship of Christ on a Sunday only if they have somehow during the week assured themselves of a Christology.

Primary with St. Paul are his mystic appreciation of Christ, based on his experience at Damascus, and the cult of Christ which was kindled at that flame. Out of the mysticism and the cult there springs his contemplation of Christ, which, though occasionally employing the forms of older Messianic dogmatic, is in its whole tone different from later Christological speculation. The subject upon which Christological speculation exercises itself so painfully is Christ as experienced by other people in the past; St. Paul's contemplation of Christ proceeds from his own experience of Christ and is nourished by the spiritual strength of the present Christ. Doctrinaire Christology looks backward into history as if under some spell; St. Paul's contemplation of Christ gazes clear-eyed into the future. Christology stands brooding beside an empty grave; St. Paul sees piercingly into a heaven full of the Living Presence. Even the cross, as viewed by the apostle, is not a bald, lifeless "fact" in the past, but a portion of the living present. To him there is no such thing as a completed "work" of Christ: Christ is working still perpetually, and in fact the best is yet to come, for Christ Himself shall come.

Ultimately, therefore, it is the religious content¹ that gives its stamp to Primitive Christianity. The Epistle to the Hebrews, being marked by a strongly theological character, with artistic literary form to match,² cannot be assigned to the classical age of Primitive Christianity. Modern scholasticism has turned confessions of the inspired into chapters of the learned, and in so doing has worked the same change on the subject-matter of the New Testament as was produced in its form when its non-literary letters were treated as works of literature and its popular language as a sacral variety of Greek. If, however, we approach the sacred Book by way of the ancient world contemporary with it, our pre-conceptions vanish.

Far away in the East there rises up before us, higher and higher above the thronging crowd of poor and lowly, a Sacred Form. To His own He is already the Saviour and giver of light; to the great world He is invisible as yet in the morning twilight, but it too shall one day bow before Him. In His profound intimacy with God and in manly strength of consciousness of His Messianic mission Jesus of Nazareth is the sheer incarnation of religious inwardness fixed solely on the Kingdom of God, and therefore He is strong to fight and worthy of the highest grace in store for Him—that of being allowed to lay down His life for the salvation of the many.

Not as second beside Him, but as first after Him and first in Him, stands the great convert in whose ardent soul all the Paschal experiences of the first disciples, with their insistent trend towards a cult of Christ, were focussed. Paul of Tarsus, having experienced in his own person more than any other man the mysteries of the cult of Christ, creates classical forms for their expression, and goes out to the Mediterranean world from which he sprung to gain adherents for the gospel that is being so gloriously extended.

11. What were the forces enabling this infant cult of Christ to gain its converts? Let us attempt to view the new propagandist religion as it presented itself characteristically to the men of the Hellenistic Mediterranean world.

Our survey of Primitive Christianity on its way from the East can of course take account only of the most strongly marked lines. Microscopic examination is as impossible as when we view some great antique sculpture in relief. We have to step backward; then, and not till then, we see what gave to the propagandist religion of Primitive Christianity its historic character. And so we will not make ten, a dozen, or maybe scores of longitudinal sections through Primitive Christianity, legitimate as such work is in itself, but we will take one single transverse section through Primitive Christianity conceived as a whole and a unity. For even though the religion of the apostles does display an abundance of different personal types, the men of antiquity were influenced first of all not by the abundance of individual elements, but by the style and spirit of the common element.

I have a lively sense of the difficulty we encounter, as men of another epoch, in taking this rapid survey of Primitive Christianity from the point of view of an ancient, and I shall be glad to receive instruction if I have seen wrongly. But to prove that the main result of my inspection is not altogether wrong I may mention an observation of mine made after I had myself ventured on that rapid survey. I found that the greatest missionary document in the New Testament, St. Paul's speech on the Areopagus at Athens,¹ which aimed at exhibiting to pagans of a great city in the Mediterranean world what was characteristic of the new religion as concisely as possible, has selected as characteristic just the very things which seem to us by the aid of recent discoveries to be so. The speech is not a verbatim report, but it is no less certain that it reveals the spirit of St. Paul, and that it is a manifesto of worldwide importance in the history of religions and of religion. For the sake of this speech the philologists ought to forgive cheerfully all the sins subsequently committed by theological fanatics against the ancient world, especially if they are themselves preparing to atone for their own shortcomings, at least for their indifference towards the greatest book of the Imperial age.

In the first place we must refer once again to the great fact of social history which has so often engaged our attention in these pages—the popular character of Primitive Christianity. Unless this fact is known and well emphasised it is impossible to explain historically the success of the attractive power of the gospel. St. Paul's mission was the mission of an artisan, not the mission of a scholar. The gospel call, intelligible to the many because uttered in the popular colloquial language of the world, never implied the social uprooting¹ of anybody by renunciation of his native stratum and elevation to the regions of anaemic theory. On the contrary, we shall see that it only strengthened and ennobled the feeling of solidarity among the humbly situated.

There is one other fact closely connected with this. The characteristic features of the propagandist religion were not contained in separate novel "ideas." The book which has most strongly insisted on the supposed novelty of countless "ideas" and "meanings" in the New Testament—I mean Cremer's Lexicon—is by reason of this dogmatic tendency one of the greatest hindrances to an historical grasp of the real expansive force of Primitive Christianity. In all that relates to the forms and meanings of words Primitive Christianity is more in contact than in contrast with the surrounding world:

"Christians are distinguished from other men neither by country, nor by language, nor by customs. For nowhere do they inhabit cities of their own, nor do they make use

In these words a Christian writer¹ of a very early period, almost contemporary with the new Testament, has sketched for us the outward contact between his co-religionists and the surrounding world.

Nor to the men of antiquity did those features appear characteristically Christian which the common sense of a modern agitator generally seizes upon as the really remarkable thing about the New Testament, and which, modestly content to annihilate Christianity by means of common sense alone, he cheerfully proceeds to refute while their no better equipped apologist as excitedly defends them—I mean the miracles. As a matter of fact the miracles gave to the New Testament a singularly popular position in the world around it. The whole ancient world is full of miracles; definite types of miracle become fixed by the tradition of thousands of years and occur again and again in all sorts of places.² Viewed amid the surroundings of its own age and social stratum the New Testament is seen to be shy, rather than otherwise, of narrating miracles.³ With Jesus, St. Paul, and St. John we even find occasionally an ironical attitude towards the popular taste for miracles,⁴ and it is highly significant that the great mass of the sayings of Jesus in the synoptic tradition are not brought into any organic connexion with miracles. Nevertheless the New Testament, as it was bound to be, is a book of miracles. If, however, we have once grasped historically the nature and necessity of the miracles in the New Testament, we realise also how dear they are to the heart of the people, how childlike in their piety, how sincerely beautiful, and what high value they can even possess as revelation. But the miracles, as such, have nothing to do with the historical peculiarity of Primitive Christianity.

First and foremost among the historical characteristics of Primitive Christianity we should rather place that which the journalism of our day, as ignorant as it is impious, often dares to represent as a perfectly obvious triviality, viz. the One living God. The solemn and impressive presence of the One God pervades the lines of that powerful manifesto on the Areopagus. Not that the world was unprepared for the One God: the Greek thinkers, Plato especially, had prepared the way for Him, and the Christian orator speaks thankfully of certain among their poets who had had knowledge of God.¹ These had been helped by the propaganda of the Greek Jews of the Dispersion with their cosmopolitan Bible.² And now He came, the One and Eternal, on the way prepared by Greeks and Jews, came to souls drawn hither and thither by the worship of many gods; to souls restlessly seeking and feeling after Him;³ and came as a God who, though Creator and Lord of Heaven and of earth,⁴ is yet worshipped without image and without temple,¹ and is always accessible even to the poorest, in a spiritual presence,²

“For in Him we live, and move, and have our being.”³

But the new cult took this One God seriously. No compromises detracted from the Christians' faith in God, and in their protest against the deification of the Sovereign they were ready before long to face even martyrdom.

And second we should place the object of the cult in the narrower sense, Jesus Christ, who did not displace the One, but was in the eyes of the worshippers His incarnation. All the preaching of the missionaries was, like the speech on Mars' Hill,⁴ a preaching of Christ; and every hearer of the missionaries felt that they were introducing the cult of Christ. Of course it was the cult of a Living Person.⁵ The cult of Christ is no feeble meditation upon “historical” facts, but pneumatic communion with One Present. The facts of the past first receive illumination from the heavenly transfiguration of the Present One. But thus illumined they appeal to the souls of those who are touched, thrilling, comforting, transforming, edifying them. The eternal glory of the Divine Child with His Father, His coming down to earth in voluntary self-abnegation and servitude, His life of poverty with the poor, His compassion, His temptations and His mighty works, the inexhaustible riches of His words, His prayers, His bitter suffering and death, and after the cross His glorious Resurrection and return to the Father—all these episodes in the great divine drama, whose peripeteia lay not in hoary antiquity, but had been witnessed a score or so of years ago, were intelligible to every soul, even to the poorest, and particularly to the poorest. And the titles with which the devotee decked the beloved object of his cult could, many of them, claim domicile in the souls of the poor and the simple: titles such as Lamb of God, the Crucified, Shepherd and Chief Shepherd,¹ Corner Stone, Door and Way, the Corn of Wheat, Bread and Vine, Light and Life, Head and Body, Alpha and Omega, Witness, Mediator and Judge, Brother, Son of Man, Son of God, Word of God and Image of God, Saviour, High Priest, Lord, King. Unfathomable in intellectual content, giving scope to every variety of personal Christian experience and every motive of self-sacrificing obedience, this series contains not a single title that was likely to impress by mere sacerdotal associations or unintelligibility. In the same way the gospel tradition of worship, with its sturdy, popular tone, was far superior to the fantastic, hysterical mythologies of the other cults, which piled one stimulant on another. So too the celebration of the mysteries of Christ required no magnificent temple or awe-inspiring cavern: it could take place wherever two or three were gathered together in His name. All great movements in the history of our race have been determined by conditions of the heart of the people, not by intellect. The triumph of the cult of Christ over all other cults—the point must here be once more emphasised—is in no remote degree explainable by the fact that from the first Christianity took deep root in the heart of the many, in the hearts of men and women, old and young, bond and free, Jews, Greeks, and Barbarians.² In its early days Christianity made conquest of hearts not because it was a "religion of redemption," as people are fond of saying nowadays, substituting the impersonal for the personal, —but because it was the cult of a Redeemer.

The Primitive Christian cult of Christ was preserved from doctrinaire congelation not only by the tendency to realise daily the presence of the living Master, but —and this is the third characteristic feature—by the expectation of His second parusia and the hope of Eternity that grew therefrom. The climax of the speech on the Areopagus was a proclamation of the approaching Last Judgment.¹ This is not the simple extension of the belief in immortality which had long been quickening here and there in men's hearts; it is a clamping together of the fortunes of this world with the future of the Kingdom of God such as probably no other religion could show. Not only were souls upheaved and brought to a state of tense excitement, but consciences were filled with profound earnestness.

And that is the last feature: the moral earnestness of Christianity. The moral element is not a foreign body within the cult, still less is it external to the sacred precinct; it is indivisibly united with the religion and the cult. No artist versed in things of the soul, whether of the earlier or of the subsequent period,—not Sophocles, nor Augustine, nor Dante, nor Goethe has succeeded in disclosing deeper depths of guilty consciousness than the apostolic pastors found in themselves. No one has borne more convincing testimony concerning personal responsibility, the necessity of inward regeneration and reconciliation with God, than the missionaries whom the Spirit of Jesus Christ impelled through the world. The organic connexion of religion with morality, which from the first formed part of the essence of Christianity, and might be experienced anew daily in the realisation of the presence of God and of Christ, was intelligible even to a plain man when next to love of God love of one's neighbour was demanded, and next to fellowship with Christ the following after Him. Moreover, the organisations of the earliest churches were visible embodiments of such social ethics as fairly filled the soul of ancient man with enthusiasm. The idea of the unity of the human race, classically expressed in the speech on the Areopagus,¹ united with St. Paul's preaching of the Body of Christ to strengthen and ennoble the feeling of solidarity which then, as the inscriptions have shown, pervaded the lower orders of society like a healthy arterial current and had led to the formation of numerous guilds² among the common people. In the "assemblies" of the Christians, which were doubtless looked upon as guilds of Christ³ by the men of the time, that brotherhood which proved itself effectual by charitable gifts dispatched over land and sea took shape. Considered even from the general point of view of social history they were probably the most vigorous organisations, and the richest in inspiration, of the whole Imperial period. We must never forget that for them those pages were penned whose remains were afterwards saved from destruction in the New Testament. A cult in whose conventicles a prayer like the Lord's Prayer could be offered and an ethical text be read such as the 13th chapter of 1 Corinthians, simple in form as it is mighty in ethos, possessed powers of gaining converts which were irresistible.

12. The paeon of love chanted at Ephesus under Nero for the poor saints of Corinth, has not perished with Corinth. Annihilated for ever, the magnificence of Nero's Corinth lies buried to-day beneath silent rubbish-mounds and green vineyards on the terraces between the mass of the Acrocorinthus and the shore of the Gulf: nothing but ruins, ghastly remnants, destruction. The words of that paeon, however, have outlasted the marble and the bronzes of the Empire, because they had an unassailable refuge in the secret depths of the soul of the people. The Corinthian Christians, who suffered other writings of St. Paul to be lost, preserved these; copies were taken and circulated; at the turning-point of the first and second century 1 Corinthians was already known at Rome, and probably St. Paul's other letters were also in circulation then in the Christian assemblies of the great Mediterranean coast-cities, guarded with the gospels and other texts of the fathers as an heirloom and treasure, separated from the false texts, becoming more and more identified with the books, and finally incorporated in the Book of the sacred writings of the New Testament.

Without shutting our eyes to the dangers that lay in the Book when it came to be judged as a book, we may nevertheless confess that this Book of the New Testament has remained the most valuable visible possession of Christendom, down to the present day.

A book from the ancient East, and lit up by the light of the dawn,—a book breathing the fragrance of the Galilean spring, and anon swept by the shipwrecking north-east tempest from the Mediterranean,—a book of peasants, fishermen, artisans, travellers by land and sea, fighters and martyrs,—a book in cosmopolitan Greek with marks of Semitic origin,—a book of the Imperial age, written at Antioch, Ephesus, Corinth, Rome,—a book of pictures, miracles, and visions, book of the village and the town, book of the people and the peoples,—the New Testament, if regard be had to the inward side of things, is the great book, chief and singular, of human souls.

Because of its psychic depth and breadth this book of the East is a book for both East and West, a book for humanity: a book ancient but eternal.

And because of the figure that emerges from the book—the Redeemer, accompanied by the multitude of the redeemed, blessing and consoling, exhorting and renewing, revealing Himself anew to every generation of the weary and heavy-laden, and growing from century to century more great—the New Testament is the Book of Life.

CHAPTER V

RETROSPECT—FUTURE WORK OF RESEARCH

1. ABOUT mid-day on Easter Sunday, 1906, at Ephesus, I was crossing in company with Friedrich von Duhn and other friends a wildly luxuriant field of acanthus on our way from the Library of Celsus to the luncheon tent hospitably erected for us by the Austrians, when my eye fell on an antique marble acanthus capital that lay to the left of the path completely embedded in the thick, exuberant greenery of living acanthus leaves.

That little episode kept recurring to my mind, and its symbolism revealed itself afterwards when, as we sailed the waters of Crete and the Cyclades, we found leisure to meditate upon what we had seen.

The contrast between the conventionalised marble acanthus leaves and their verdant wild originals seemed to me an image of the contrast between the methods of research characteristic of my own special studies.

On the one hand the method which conventionalises the New Testament by isolating and canonising its language, by turning its non-literary texts into literature and its religious confessions into hard and stony dogma ;—on the other hand the method which takes possession in the work-room of every one who studies the New Testament historically and psychologically as the ancient East at large can and must be studied at the present day.

This method does not look upon the New Testament as a museum of statues in marble and bronze, but as a spacious garden, God's garden, thriving in luxurious growth under the spring sunshine of the East. No painter can reproduce the pale green of its young fig-leaves and the blood-red of its Easter anemones; the sombre melancholy of its olive groves, the gentle tremor of its vine tendrils cannot be described; and in the sacred precinct, where for the pure a fountain of living water springs beneath primeval cedars, the solemn silence bids the surveyor avault who had approached with line and measuring staff.

Some day, when yet stronger waves of light come flooding over to us from the East, it will be recognised that the restoration of the New Testament to its native home, its own age and social level, means something more than the mere repatriation of our sacred Book. It brings with it new life and depth to all our conceptions of Primitive Christianity. But already perhaps we may say that when theologians engage in the study of inscriptions, papyri, and ostraca of the Imperial period, their work is not the pastime of cranks, but is justified by the imperious demands of the present state of scholarship. For a long time the theologians were content to don the cast-off garments of the philologists, and to drag with them through the New Testament critical methods that had long been given up by the masters of the scientific study of antiquities, until they fairly dropped to pieces. Are we now to wait another twenty years, and then go limping after the philologists, who by that time will have struck still better sources? Or shall we not rather, undeterred by the absurd and depreciatory remark about being "mere" philologists, ourselves lay hands on the mighty mass of material for research that a bountiful Providence has bestowed on our unworthiness? In particular, the one great historical fact which must be recognised if a man is to be either a good exegetist and systematist or a good preacher and pastor—the fact of the close inward connexion between the gospel and the lower classes—cannot be realised by visionary speculation, however ingenious, working solely upon the common-places of obsolete monographs. Such knowledge must be deciphered and painfully deduced from the thousands and tens of thousands of lines of torn and mangled writing newly recovered from the age of the New Testament. Albert Kalthoff¹ was certainly a gifted writer, and he certainly had a heart for the lower orders of the people, but he was not fitted to be the historian or even the historical philosopher of the origins of our faith, and his attempt to democratise Primitive Christianity was doomed to failure because he had not by the tedious process of detailed work made himself at home among the mass of humanity in the Imperial period. Instead of investigating the real psyche of the masses and ultimately discovering within the masses the leading personalities who made the individual to be an individual indeed and raised him out of the masses, Kalthoff and his works ended like an unhappy “stickit minister”²—with a witches’ sabbath of homeless ideas.³

2. The method of research suggested by the new texts is valuable also in tracing the later history of Christianity. I merely mention the fact, and may be allowed to refer to the hints given in Chapter III., in the course of interpreting certain early Christian letters emanating from the lower classes. Even when Christianity had risen from the workshop and the cottage to the palace and the schools of learning, it did not desert the workshop and the cottage. The living roots of Christianity remained in their native soil—the lower ranks of society—and regularly in the cycle of the years, when autumn had gathered the topmost leaves and the dry boughs had snapped beneath the storms of winter, the sap rose upward and woke the buds from slumber, with promise of blossom and rich days of fruitage.¹ Jesus the carpenter and Paul the weaver of tent-cloth mark the beginnings, and again at the most momentous crisis in the history of later Christianity there comes another homo novus in the person of Luther, the miner's son and peasant's grandson.

The history of Christianity, with all its wealth of incident, has been treated much too often as the history of the Christian literary upper class, the history of theologians and ecclesiastics, schools, councils, and parties, whereas Christianity itself has often been most truly alive in quarters remote from councils and outside the polemical tractates of Protestant zealots. One great merit of the book on German Church History in the nineteenth century by Christian Tischhauser,¹ lecturer at the Bâle Missionary College,² is that it takes account of undercurrents which are usually ignored either because they erect themselves no literary monuments, or because the humble literature produced by them is overwhelmed, if it ever survives the day for which it was written, and crowded out into the worst-lighted rooms of the bibliotheca christiana by the collected works of writers on academic Christianity and church politics.

From gospel times down to our own day Christian piety, simple and vigorous, has been a living force in the middle and lower classes. There its own popular forms of expression were created and its own popular types of personality were experienced. To investigate the laws determining the formation of these expressions, to study the psychology of the inner life of spontaneous Christian piety, is a task of great charm and value to the scholar and an absolutely indispensable pre-requisite in the training of a popular pastorate. The training of our candidates for the ministry is as a rule far too scholastic for the actual work they are called upon to do in practice. Most of us criticise the forms of expression chosen by popular Christianity in the past and in the present, much as Blass did the letter written by the bad boy Theon³—as if it were a case of degeneration.

There are very few people, for instance, who can enter into sympathetic relation with the popular art of the Catacombs and with the naïveté, true-hearted as it often is, of the early Christian popular literature that has come down to us in the remains of "apocryphal" gospels and acts of apostles. Deluded by the belief that there is no value except in things that have really happened and can be proved to have happened, we cast out the miracles in these popular books, and with them the books themselves, upon the dust-heap.

As a matter of fact, however, the child Jesus healing the woodman who had been injured by the falling axe,¹ and the Jesus who restores the withered hand of a stonemason,² are striking proofs of the intenseness of the confidence with which the various handicrafts did homage to the carpenter's Son, each in its own place of work. We know how it will be: to shepherds He will become the Chief Shepherd, to sailors the steersman, to travellers the guide, to soldiers the commander; He will bless the seed for the peasants, and He will sit at table with us, a daily invited guest, in the breaking of bread.

3. Thus I have already been led to speak of the work in store for research.³ Further to speak on this subject is at the same time easy and yet difficult for me. It is easy because I believe I can discern problems in plenty, because I am convinced that they must be solved, and because I would fain regard a humble fraction of them as filling a part of my own life. On the other hand I find it difficult to speak of problems, because to do so is to speak of things unfinished. It raises a vision of books by the dozen lying open upon one another, of hundreds of written slips and sheets of MS., of library dust and work done by artificial light on dull days, of hopes raised only to be dashed, and of the investigator's sorry bartering day after day a single problem solved for ten others unsolved. This last part of my book is difficult more especially because I know that what the student strives to attain is something great, whereas what he actually does attain will be but the poor work of man after all, and by speaking of the great thing too soon he awakens expectations which he cannot fulfil. But this, I take it, is the fate, and I do not hesitate to say the happy fate, of all real research, showing how closely akin it is to the work of the artist: its powers must be strengthened by struggling towards an ideal which is unattainable, because ideal, but which nevertheless always remains the goal to be attained.

The most obvious task has reference to the written records themselves. As many new texts as possible must be discovered and published with all care.

The period of excavations for papyri in Egypt is by no means ended, and many workers are still required for the systematic collection and preservation of the despised ostraca.

New editions of the inscriptions on stone, metal, etc. are, as was shown in the first chapter, in active preparation at the present time on a large scale. But the amount of inscriptions still lying underground or built into the walls of mediaeval and modern edifices is beyond computation; the limekilns fortunately have not swallowed up everything. The remark may be added that, whereas the acquisition of new texts, especially where excavations have to be made, is largely a question of funds, it is still possible at the present day to accomplish much with a comparatively small outlay if the money is entrusted to the right people. In Germany our gratitude is especially due to the wealthy private individuals who of late years have shown their interest in the cause of learning by supplying the means for excavations and purchases, England and America having long ago set us an admirable example in this direction.

The next duty of scholars is to discuss the texts scientifically in their bearings on language, literature, religious and general social history. Editors ought to facilitate this discussion by making the arrangement of the printed texts as convenient and clear as possible. There should be no false shame about providing (always, if possible) translations of the texts; many hidden difficulties first show themselves, even to the specialist, when he really begins to translate sentence by sentence.

Of the many individual problems which the new texts can help to solve there are some to which I would call special attention. The types of popular narrative style must be traced throughout the extent of the ancient civilisations, particularly the following: narratives of miracles,¹ accounts of healing and deliverance from danger, narratives of expiation,² dreams, visions, travellers' tales of adventure, and stories of martyrdom. The history of ancient letter-writing, accompanied by careful reconstruction of autograph letters and fragments, must be continued further with special attention to the formal phraseology which is of such importance in problems of chronology. The letters and allied texts must moreover be interpreted as reflections of the family life and soul-life of antiquity, particularly with the object of investigating the emotions at work among the lower classes. All the resources of ancient folklore are to be pressed into the service of this research: it is not to be a mere collection of curiosities enabling us to feel the contrast between ourselves and antiquity; it must be reconstitutive psychology of the people, enlightening us as to our permanent contact with antiquity.

4. Most of these problems, no doubt, will find their solution beyond the pale of the Faculties of Theology, although the hard-and-fast divisions between the guilds of learning have vanished here and there, and are still vanishing, greatly to the advantage of research. But there will be quite enough for the theologians to do. The tasks presented to us may be summed up in a single sentence: We have to establish, with the aid of the authentic records of the ancient world,¹ the positive position, based on social history and psychology, on which scholarship may take its stand for the study of the New Testament. The one-sided method of retrospection, which has too often blinded us to religion by its insistence on dogma, must give way to inquiries concerning the history of religion and the psychology of religion. That is the motto, as it were, and in it more stress is to be laid than usual upon the word religion. The study of purely religious texts—manifestations of piety that certainly did not proceed from learned meditation—must inevitably open our eyes to the living piety with which the New Testament is instinct.

These historical and psychological inquiries will lead on to a new problem, the solution of which has an equally important bearing on the detailed exegesis and on the collective criticism of the classical texts of Christianity, viz. the problem of defining the various types of religious production within the New Testament. What many have taken to be one vast expanse of neutral tint will be seen to be a harmonious succession of the most varied shades of colour. What injustice, for instance, has been done to the great Evangelist, St. John, by demanding from him a “progress of thought” in the speeches in his gospel, and a “consecutive plan” in his epistle,¹ as if his were a systematic nature. St. John has no liking for progress along an unending straight road; he loves a circling flight, like his symbol, the eagle. There is something hovering and brooding about his production; repetitions are in no wise abnormal with him, but the marks of a contemplation which he cherishes as a precious inheritance from St. Paul and further intensifies. The other types of religious production may be worked out with the same clearness of definition—Jesus most certainly, Paul also, and the rest of the seers, consolers, and evangelists.

In far higher degree than is possible to any kind of dogmatist exegesis, the historical and psychological exegesis will help us to understand why the cult of Christ was destined to mark the turning-point in the world's religion. And the forces of inward life which this exegetical method sets free once more in the New Testament will bring forth fruit in quite another manner in our own generation, bestowing refreshment on the weary and heavy-laden (not on the well-filled and the bored) to-day as on the first day.

5. Finally, among the multitude of particular problems there is one which may be specially selected as probably the most important task of New Testament research at the present time, viz. the preparation of a new Lexicon to the New Testament.

A lexicon is only another name for a dictionary. A dictionary, most people would say, is a very simple thing—a book containing foreign words in alphabetical order, with their English meanings. So there is nothing remarkable about it, nothing remarkably learned or scientific; it is in the first place a business enterprise, a book to meet the requirements of practical life, ranking with Bradshaw and the Post Office Directory: a portly volume perhaps, but its inside merits more dependent on the printer than on the author; the chief thing is to find a publisher, and all the rest will follow. Memory reverts, perhaps, to our schooldays. That awful passage in Caesar, where he describes how he bridged the Rhine—how unintelligible it all was, until we looked up the hard words in the dictionary and saw in an instant what each one of them “meant.” Nothing could have been simpler for a boy who knew his A B C and had the gump-tion to look for trabs under the letter T.

If there is a tendency in some quarters to despise dictionaries as “unscientific,” there exists a no less widespread tendency to bow slavishly to their pronouncements. “It is in the dictionary, so it must be right”—that is the spoken or unspoken thought in innumerable cases where a person hurriedly consults the dictionary to settle the meaning of a foreign word.

The scientific attitude towards lexicography begins the minute we learn that the meaning of a given word cannot always be got straight from the dictionary, that every word presents a problem in itself, and that we have no right to speak scientifically about a word until we know its history, i.e. its origin, its meaning, and how meanings have been multiplied by division or modification.

Scientific lexicography undertakes, therefore, to reconstruct the history of words from the earliest times to which our sources go back, in fact from the primitive prehistoric period of the language which comparative philology establishes theoretically, down to the time when we find the words spoken or written by a given individual.

Hence it follows that lexicography, in spite of many technical appendages, in spite of the fact that the customary alphabetical arrangement of words is dictated by practical and technical, and not by scientific considerations, is after all one of the historical sciences. It compiles the historical statistics of the language.

Lexicography in this sense is still a young science. Lexicons were first made thousands of years ago, dictionaries on historical principles not until the nineteenth century. As examples I may mention two of the latest big dictionaries, which are still incomplete :

the Egyptian Dictionary prepared by the Berlin Academy of Sciences, and the Thesaurus Linguae Latinae,¹ a great Latin Dictionary which has the joint support of a number of associated Academies.

A Thesaurus Graecae Linguae also exists, and has often been cited in this book. It is a costly work in nine huge folios, but it by no means fulfils the requirements of scientific lexicography,² and it is altogether out of date. The same may be said of all Greek dictionaries whatever, even of the "Great Lexicon"³ now in course of publication at Athens, which is only great, and not a lexicon at all. There is probably no department of classical philology in so backward a state at the present day as this of Greek lexicography. There is not a single manual Greek lexicon which takes adequate account of the great advances that have been made in etymology,⁴ or of semasiological problems, or of the enormous additions to our statistical materials furnished by the new texts,⁵ though it is to be hoped the new edition of Franz Passow's old Lexicon undertaken by Wilhelm Crönert will mark the beginning of an improvement. The fact that our present lexicons hardly ever

³ Μεγά Λεξικόν της Ελληνικής Γλώσσης Ανεστή Κωνσταντινίδου, εν Αθηναις, 1901 ff. (3 volumes so far).

suggest an opening for learned discussion, and hardly ever hint at the existence of open questions, gives them a more dogmatic than scientific character.

The problems that modern lexicography is called upon to solve have been illustrated in a masterly manner by Hermann Diels in the case of a single word,¹ and the same authority has elsewhere shown how impossible it would be to carry out the gigantic proposals for a new Greek Thesaurus.² The preliminary work would cost £500,000, there would be 120 volumes, and the probable selling price of this monster would be £300. Instead of one single comprehensive lexicon it would be more advisable to compile about ten separate lexicons.

One of these great lexicons would have to deal with the whole of the Biblical and early ecclesiastical writings, both literary and non-literary, beginning with the Septuagint Bible and extending over the New Testament to the Greek Fathers—not in order to isolate these texts linguistically once again, but for the sake of their inner relationship and congruity.

First, however, there is much preliminary work to be done for this Thesaurus of Biblical and Christian Greek. The chief thing is to place the lexicography of the Septuagint and of the New Testament on the new foundations afforded by the vocabulary of the contemporary world as we have

The question of the Greek Thesaurus is further discussed by Paul Kretschmer, Der Plan eines Thesaurus der griechischen Sprache, Glotta, Vol. I. pp. 339–348.—A plan has recently been set on foot in Greece for celebrating the centenary of the War of Liberation, in 1921, by the publication of a great historical lexicon of the Greek language from the earliest times down to the present day; cf. it in the inscriptions, papyri, etc. ; and the practical needs of Biblical students suggest that at the present time the more necessary of these two special tasks is the production of a revised New Testament Lexicon which shall promote the work of research without ceasing to be valuable for purposes of study.

The lexicography of the Greek Bible can look back upon a venerable history. Philo of Alexandria, the contemporary of Jesus and St. Paul, was in all probability the author of a work explaining the Hebrew names in the Septuagint, which was afterwards used by Origen and St. Jerome. Portions of this earliest lexical tradition made their way among the Christian common people at an early date, as is shown by a precious papyrus fragment¹ of the 3rd or 4th century A.D. (Figure 62) from Egypt, now in the Heidelberg University Library. This fragment—one of the few quite early Christian relics extant—is inscribed, probably for use as an amulet, with powerful and comforting Biblical names and phrases, accompanied by a Greek translation which is dependent on the learned lexical tradition.² The text, exactly transliterated, is as follows:—

In spite of the great age of the Biblical lexical fragments that have come down to us, the scientific lexicography of the Greek New Testament is still young. Its founder was Georg Pasor,² a theologian of Nassau, who printed the first special lexicon to the New Testament at Herborn in 1619 (Figure 63), and by means of this book exerted a powerful influence on New Testament studies in all Protestant countries down to the end of the eighteenth century. It appeared in a constant succession of new editions, pirated editions, and adaptations, and was the parent

The greatest additions to New Testament lexicography were made by the eighteenth-century compilers of "Observations," the most remarkable of whom, Walch, has been already mentioned above.² It was chiefly their material that supplied the later lexicographers, including those whose books we still use to-day: Wilke and Grimm, Cremer, Joseph Henry Thayer, etc. Of these Thayer, working upon the solid foundation of Wilke and Grimm, produced the best and maturest results.³ But even Thayer is now out of date. In the second and fourth chapters of this book I have shown, I think, what an abundance of material is now waiting to be worked up systematically. For no other book of the ancient world are the new texts of the Graeco-Roman period lexically so productive as for the New Testament.

The first main task of the future lexicon will be to place the New Testament vocabulary in living linguistic connexion with the contemporary world. Only in this way can the right place be found for every word, the place to which it belongs in the complete history of the Greek language, and only in this way can the points of contact and of contrast be established between the contemporary world and the cult-words used in the gospels and apostolic writings. An author who undertook a New Testament Lexicon at the present day without sketching in each article the history and statistics of words and meanings, would banish the apostle of the world from his own world, banish the gospel from history, shut off the New Testament from the light of research, and take up his own position far behind Thayer and Grimm, even far behind Cremer, along with Stelhorn and Schirlitz, i.e. outside the pale of scientific lexicography altogether. The second main task is to ascertain carefully the phases in the changes of meaning. It will first be necessary, it is true, to bestow some more reflection on the nature and laws of the changes to which religious concepts are liable—this being perhaps the most interesting branch of the whole subject of semasiology.¹ The third main task is to simplify once more and put warmth again into the popular concepts of Primitive Christianity, which have been artificially complicated and deprived of life by scholastic prejudice and a too anxious process of isolation. The new Lexicon will bring out once more the simplicity, inwardness, and force of the utterances of evangelists and apostles. And as in the days long gone an Egyptian Christian wrote down on the papyrus the interpretation of powerful and comforting holy names to be his shield and buckler against all evils, so perhaps the new Lexicon will meet with that best of all rewards, far exceeding all scholarly recognition, the reward of exerting an influence in real life. It may be that in a lonely parsonage in the Westerwald,² or in the hired lodgings of the city preacher, it will help on Saturday mornings to unfold the thought in the sacred text to the benefit of the Sabbath congregation.

² [A rather bleak hilly district of Nassau, north-west of Coblenz, bounded by the Dill (p. 113, n. 1 above) and the Lahn. The author was born at a village on the Lahn, and Herborn, where he and Pasor worked (pp. 229 n., 416 above), is on the Dill. TR.]

Inspired by such objects to work for, the New Testament researcher hears with composure and without lasting disgust the unbrotherly insults of excited ignoramuses who, agitating for the quiet Kingdom of God with the paltry means of this world, and imitating in their dwarfishness the intolerance of the heroes, think themselves able to break the bonds that connect him with his fathers and forefathers—bonds that he would fain cherish with reverence and gratitude.

Such noise from the street disturbs him less, perhaps, than a feeling that comes over him at times in his own study. He feels there is a painful side to the learned work of the scholar—a risk that amid the chaos of paper-slips he may lose his own self, while the age he lives in calls for men who can do more than decipher old handwriting, excerpt words on paper-slips, and read proof-sheets. In the midst of his learned labours comes the question: Is not more accomplished by the men who hoe the vineyard, who descend the mine, repair the steamer's screw, help a degenerate back to the right path, exhaust themselves as teachers, leaders, and evangelists among the masses—do they not all do more work for God's cause than the man who proposes to write a new book, thus adding to the hundredweights which already bind our generation in slavery to the past? . . .

It is always the New Testament itself that calls the man of research back from his wandering thoughts to work on the New Testament again. Daily it bears witness to him of its own veriest nature: the little Book is not one of the paralysing and enslaving forces of the past, but it is full of eternal strength to make strong and to make free.

JEWISH PRAYERS FOR VENGEANCE FOUND AT RHENEIA

from Philologus 61 [1902] pp. 253-265)

THE "prayers for vengeance" from Rheneia (Rhenea), though published long ago and several times discussed, at least in part, were first made really accessible in 1901, by Adolf Wilhelm.¹ He not only reproduced them in facsimile, but also for the first time settled with certainty the questions of their connexion, their provenance, and their age. They are inscribed on two gravestones, one of which is now in the Museum at Bucharest, and the other in the National Museum at Athens.² That the stele at Athens originally came from Rheneia (Magna Delos), the burial-place of the inhabitants of ancient Delos, Wilhelm was able to show from a note which he re-discovered in the first publication³; and he proved clearly that the stone at Bucharest was of the same origin. Wilhelm also recognised that the inscriptions were Jewish and closely connected with the text of the Septuagint, yet even after his fundamental labours the texts still require to be interpreted, and their high value for the history of the Jewish religion in the Hellenistic world still stands in need of appreciation.

¹ Jahreshefte des Österreichischen Archäologischen Institutes in Wien, 4 (1901) Supplement, cols. 9-18. The whole previous literature is there referred to. In col. 9, n. 1, read LXXVII instead of XXXVII.

³ Expédition scientifique de Morée . . . Architecture, Sculptures, Inscriptions et Vues . . . publiées par Abel Blouet, III., Paris, 1836, plate xiii., cf. p. 7; and especially the exhaustive commentary by Le Bas in the separately paged supplement to this work: Inscriptions copiées dans les îles de la mer Égée, p. 41 ff.

I will first describe the stones and reproduce the texts according to Wilhelm, checking his statements by my own observations of the originals. The Bucharest stele, being the less damaged of the two, had better be described first. I saw it on 5 April, 1906. It is made of white marble, broken at the top, provided with a tenon underneath, and now still $16\frac{1}{2}$ inches high, 12 inches broad, and $2\frac{1}{2}$ inches thick. Both sides of the stone have the same inscription, but with a different division into lines and other trifling variations (Figures 64 and 65). Above the written words on both sides there is a pair of uplifted hands, with the palms turned outwards. The text of the side A (Figure 64), which still shows traces of having been originally picked out in red, runs as follows (the words have been separated; accents and punctuation are supplied, and the variant readings of the side B are noted below; no attempt has been made to exhibit the differences in the division into lines):—

The Athenian stele, which I saw on 8 May, 1906, is also of white marble, adorned with a pediment above, and provided with a tenon below; it is much damaged above and on the left side, but still 22 inches high, 13 inches broad, and $3\frac{1}{2}$ inches thick. It is inscribed only upon one side, and there is not the slightest doubt, judging from the general structure of the mutilated upper portion, and from certain remaining traces, that above the inscription there was engraved a pair of hands similar to those on the Bucharest stele¹ (Figure 66). The text, which may be confidently restored with the help of the Bucharest inscription, runs as follows:—

The question of the age of these texts at Athens and Bucharest shall be postponed until after their interpretation; but we may remark here that according to Wilhelm they both originated not only at the same spot, Rheneia, but also at the same time. There is such close agreement between the two inscriptions throughout that we are entitled to interpret them as two texts of the same original.

It is evident at the first glance that the texts are either of Jewish or of Christian origin, for they are a mosaic from the Septuagint Bible which was common to the Greek Jews and the Greek Christians. The echoes of the New Testament observed by Otto Hirschfeld² are in fact, as closer comparison shows, echoes of the Septuagint. The texts contain nothing specifically and exclusively Christian either in formula or in symbol; nevertheless decisive judgment must be suspended until the interpretation has been attempted.

The pair of hands above the writing is, as Wilhelm¹ has already shown, a by no means uncommon symbol of the invocation of divine help on pagan stones. It might very easily pass over into the usage of Jews and Christians, since they too lifted up their hands in praying.² In this case, moreover, a prayer is being uttered—a prayer for vengeance on the unknown miscreants by whom two murders had been committed. The rites prescribed by Old Testament law for atonement in the case of murder by an unknown hand facilitated the borrowing of the symbolic pair of hands in this case.³ Though this ritual, as shown by our texts, was not observed in the present case, we may nevertheless suppose that here and there a devout person, who knew his Bible, at sight of the uplifted hands would think not only of hands in prayer, but also of hands free from blood.⁴

The prayer begins with the verb ἐπικαλοῦμαι, which occurs in the same way very commonly in the LXX and in early Christian texts,⁵ and often in the forms of prayer found in magical texts.⁶ The combination ἐπικαλοῦμαι . . . τὸν θεὸν τὸν ὕψιστον has good analogies, e.g. in Ecclus. xlv. 5, ἐπεκαλέσατο τὸν ὕψιστον δυνάστην; xlvii. 5, ἐπεκαλέσατο γὰρ κύριον τὸν ὕψιστον; 2 Macc. iii. 31, ἐπικαλέσασθαι τὸν ὕψιστον. We also find ἀξιῶ used of prayer, e.g. LXX Jer. vii. 16, xi. 14 (synonymous with προσεύχομαι), Ecclus. li. 14, and frequently in the second book of Maccabees. It is still more significant that both verbs are found together in the same sentence in Jer. xi. 14, though not in the same combination as in our text. On the

expression τὸν θεὸν τὸν ὑψιστον Wilhelm¹ refers to E. Schürer's and F. Cumont's well-known researches on the cult of the "Most High God," but what we have here is not a divine name in use among monotheistic worshippers who derived it only indirectly from the Bible: it is in fact the direct equivalent of the Biblical יהוה יְהוָה.

Very remarkable too is the next divine name, τὸν κύριον τῶν πνευμάτων καὶ πάσης σαρκός, which is obviously (as also in Clem. Rom. 1 Cor. lxi., δεσπότης τῶν πνευμάτων καὶ κύριος πάσης σαρκός) based upon the formulae, LXX Numbers xvi. 22, xxvii. 16, θεὸς or κύριος ὁ θεὸς τῶν πνευμάτων καὶ πάσης σαρκός. The first part of the formula, "Lord of the spirits," is especially characteristic. Already in the Septuagint formula the πνέματα are the ministering spirits, the angels, who in Hebrews i. 14 are expressly so called. In the second part of the Book of Enoch "Lord of the spirits" is an almost constant appellation of the Deity. Elsewhere the form is not to my knowledge a common one, apart from the Greek liturgies and magical texts; of earlier date may be mentioned 2 Macc. iii. 24, on good authority, and the above-cited passage from the first Epistle of Clement.

For the construction of ἐπικαλοῦμαι καὶ ἄξιῶ with ἐπί, I have no Septuagint example to offer. But the sense of "against," rightly advocated also in 2 Cor. i. 23 (μάρτυρα τὸν θεὸν ἐπικαλοῦμαι ἐπὶ τὴν ἐμὴν ψυχὴν) by Heinrici and others,² is quite certain. The phrase δόλωι φονεύσαντας at once reminds us of the old Biblical law, which distinguishes between accidental homicide (Deut. xix. 4, ὃς ἂν πατάξῃ τὸν πλησίον αὐτοῦ οὐκ εἰδώς, cf. verse 5, τύχῃ) and deliberate murder (Exodus xxi. 14, εἰ δέ τις ἐπιθήτῃ τῷ πλησίον ἀποκτείνει αὐτὸν δόλῳ). The word δόλω is also used in Deuteronomy xxvii. 24 (ὁ τύπτων τὸν πλησίον δόλῳ) in the forensic sense.

The words immediately following are all found in the LXX (φονεύω very often; φαρμακεύω, 2 Chron. xxxiii. 6, Psalm lvii. [lviii.] 6, 2 Macc. x. 13; ταλαίπωρος frequently, e.g. of a woman Psalm cxxxvi. [cxxxvii.] 8; ἄωρος frequently, e.g., with nothing to correspond in the Hebrew, Proverbs x. 6, xi. 30,

On the names of the two murdered girls, Heraclea and Marthina, Wilhelm,¹ who correctly explains the latter as formed from Μάρθα, has already made all necessary remarks. He conjectures that two other gravestones discovered in Rheneia with the inscriptions Ἡράκλῃα χρηστὴ χαίρει (Corpus Inscriptionum Graecarum II, add. No. 2322 b. 69; Le Bas, Îles, 2039) and Μαρθείνη Εὐτάκτου χρηστὴ χαίρει (Corpus Inscriptionum Graecarum II, add. No. 2322 b. 78; Le Bas, Îles, 2041) relate to the same two murdered victims, but concerning this I do not venture to pronounce. But I would at least raise the question whether we are to suppose two separate murders at different times, or whether Heraclea and Marthina met their death at the murderer's hand simultaneously. Seeing that the two inscriptions agree even in the decisive passage, ll. 10 ff., I take the latter assumption to be more probable, though the other is of course not altogether excluded.

Very familiar to the reader of the Septuagint is ἐχχέαντας αὐτῆς τὸ ἀναίτιον αἷμα (A 5 f., B 6 f.). αἷμα ἐκχέω is a phrase, not indeed specifically "Biblical,"² but very common in the Greek Bible. αἷμα ἀναίτιον occurs five times, and in Deuteronomy xix. 10 we have the whole phrase, καὶ οὐκ ἐκχυθήσεται αἷμα ἀναίτιον. After the two verbs of asking ἵνα (line 7) is used instead of ὅπως, as often in the Bible and other Hellenistic texts.³ The sense of the petition ἵνα οὕτως γένηται κτλ., which has a formal ring, is: "May the guilty murderers be overtaken by a violent death like that of their innocent victims"; οὕτως is strongly accentuated and seems really to mean "in the same way," a use which we may understand as an abridgment of expressions like LXX Judges i. 7, καθὼς οὖν ἐποίησα, οὕτως ἀνταπέδωκέ μοι ὁ θεός. On the subject of retaliation the prayer takes exactly the view of Genesis ix. 6, ὁ ἐκχέων αἷμα ἀνθρώπου ἀντὶ τοῦ αἵματος αὐτοῦ ἐκχυθήσεται, ὅτι ἐν εἰκόνι θεοῦ ἐποίησα τὸν ἄνθρωπον, and Deuteronomy xix. 10–13. The addition of the phrase τέκνων αὐτῶν is thoroughly Biblical, as in Exodus xx. 5, ἐγὼ γάρ εἰμι κύριος ὁ θεός σου, θεὸς ζηλωτῆς ἀποδιδούς ἁμαρτίας πατέρων ἐπὶ τέκνα ἕως τρίτης καὶ τετάρτης γενεᾶς τοῖς μισοῦσί με, cf. Exodus xxxiv. 7, Numbers xiv. 18.

"The all-seeing Lord" is also a not uncommon formula¹ in the Bible: LXX Job xxxiv. 23, ὁ γὰρ κύριος πάντας (Cod. A τὰ πάντα)² ἐφορᾷ; similarly 2 Macc. xii. 22, xv. 2: cf. Additions to Esther v. 1 (xv. 2), τὸν πάντων ἐπόπτην θεόν; 3 Macc. ii. 21, ὁ πάντων ἐπόπτης θεός; 2 Macc. vii. 35 (cf. iii. 39), τοῦ παντοκράτορος ἐπόπτου θεοῦ. Later echoes of this formula are very marked: e.g. Epistle of Aristee (ed. Wendland) 16, τὸν γὰρ πάντων ἐπόπτην καὶ κτίστην θεόν; Clem. Rom. 1 Cor. lxiv., ὁ παντεπόπτης θεός, cf. lv. 6, lix. 3, τὸν ἐπόπτην ἀνθρωπίνων ἔργων; Hadrumetum lead tablet,³ 36, παντεφόπτου; a prayer in the Great Magical Papyrus (Paris) calls the holy πάρεδροι of the Great God (the angels) παντεπόπτας (l. 1369) and ἐφόπτας⁴ (l. 1353); in the same papyrus God is called ὁ δύσιν καὶ ἀνατολὴν ἐφορῶν καὶ μεσημβρίαν καὶ ἄρκτον ἀποβλέπων⁵ (l. 2195 f.).

The invocation of the ἀγγελοι θεοῦ (line 10) does not warrant us in assuming a special cult of the angels. The prayer, in fact, keeps well within the bounds of the Biblical creed. An invocation of the angels, and the assurance that the angels carry out God's will, are both found in LXX Psalm cii. (ciii.) 20, εὐλογεῖτε τὸν κύριον πάντες οἱ ἄγγελοι αὐτοῦ, δυνατοὶ ἰσχυρεῖς ποιοῦντες τὸν λόγον αὐτοῦ. The corresponding ideas on this subject in later Jewish belief have already been pointed out by Wilhelm.⁶

The most important and, for the general criticism of the texts, decisive passage is undoubtedly line 10 ff.: ὦι πᾶσα ψυχὴ ἐν τῇ σήμερον ἡμέρᾳ ταπεινῶνται μεθ' ἱκετείας. The phrases πᾶσα ψυχὴ, ἐν τῇ σήμερον ἡμέρᾳ, ταπεινῶ, ἱκετεία, are all more or less common in the Greek Old Testament. The whole sentence has the sound of LXX Leviticus xxiii. 29, πᾶσα ψυχὴ, ἥτις μὴ ταπεινωθήσεται ἐν αὐτῇ τῇ ἡμέρᾳ ταύτῃ, which passage Wilhelm⁷ probably had in mind. But we should explain little by the bare reference to this formal dependence on the Greek Bible. The question is: What is to be understood by "this same day, on which every soul is humbled with supplication"? It must refer to some day of celebration—as remarked by Dittenberger,¹ though he gives no further explanation. From the text itself it seems only to follow that a general day of prayer is meant. But we find more than this. The expression ψυχὴν ταπεινῶν is obviously used, not in the general ethical sense of "humbling one's self" (as in LXX Isaiah ii. 17; Psalm xliii. [xliv.] 26; Eccus. ii. 17, vii. 17; cf. the use of ταπεινῶν in the Gospels and other early Christian texts), but, as the context surely shows, in the technical sense of "mortifying the flesh" = "fasting." The Greek expression is an exact imitation of the Hebrew נָפַח וָעָרָה and is used thus in LXX Leviticus xvi. 29, 31; xxiii. 27, 29, 32; Isaiah lviii. 3, 5 (in verse 10 it means "to hunger," probably by an extension of this sense); Judith iv. 9 (cf. verse 13). In Psalm xxxiv. [xxxv.] 13 it is expressly explained: καὶ ἐταπεινῶν ἐν νηστείᾳ τὴν ψυχὴν μου. Thus our text speaks not only of a day of prayer, but of a day of prayer and fasting. Are we then to imagine a day of prayer and fasting specially appointed on account of the murder of the two girls? The authorities frequently mention² public days of fasting on the occasion of some great public danger or heavy visitation; especially instructive, for instance, is the statement in the Mishna (Taanith III. 6) that the elders of Jerusalem once proclaimed a fast because the wolves had devoured two little children. We might assume from the nature of things that these days of fasting were also days of prayer, but the fact is expressly confirmed by the account in Judith iv. 9–13.

On the other hand, against the assumption that the fellow-believers of the two murdered maidens in Delos observed an extraordinary day of prayer and fasting whilst the awful shock of the dark deed was still upon them,³ we must set the words πᾶσα ψυχῇ, which point rather to a general day of prayer and fasting. The word πᾶσα must of course not be pressed; it does not mean every person whatever, but every one that raises his hands in prayer to the "Most High God, the Lord of the spirits and of all flesh," in other words, every Jew.

Thus we have already taken sides on the question whether the text is Christian or Jewish. The fast day on which all fast and pray is evidently the jōm hakkippurīm, the great Day of Atonement, to which the above-mentioned provisions of the law concerning ψυχὴν ταπεινοῦν relate. All the other expressions in the texts might be either Jewish or Christian; the really characteristic sentence, however, fairly provokes reference to the Jewish Day of Atonement, whilst there is scarcely an early Christian festival to which it could be made to apply without forcing the meaning. Wilhelm's conjecture that the texts are Jewish is admirably confirmed by this explanation.

On this point a further remark must be made. That a prayer for vengeance should be offered on the Day of Atonement is not remarkable, when we find that later prayers for use on that day also ask for vengeance for blood that has been shed.¹ I cannot refrain from remarking that, while prayers such as these are certainly below the level of the prayer in Luke xxiii. 34, the prayer in Revelation vi. 10 is not a whit above them.

The last two lines also are in agreement with the whole tenor of the rest. I suppose that the copy given to the stone-cutter ran: ἵνα ἐγδικήσῃς τὸ αἷμα τὸ ἀναίτιον καὶ ζητήσῃς τὴν ταχίστην, and can see no necessity for Dittenberger's transposition (adopted by Wilhelm²) ἵνα ζητήσῃς τὸ ἀναίτιον αἷμα καὶ ἐγδικήσῃς τὴν ταχίστην. The two verbs are synonymous, so that in LXX Joel iii. [iv.] 21, for instance, Cod. A writes ἐκδικήσω τὸ αἷμα instead of ἐκζητήσω τὸ αἷμα. αἷμα ἐκδικεῖν occurs elsewhere in LXX Deuteronomy xxxii. 43, 2 Kings ix. 7; αἷμα ζητεῖν is used like αἷμα ἐκζητεῖν, which is very common in the LXX (cf. also Luke xi. 50).

The ending τὴν ταχίστην, a formula found also in 1 Macc. xi. 22, reminds one of the very common ἡδὴ ἡδὴ ταχὺ ταχύ of many prayers of conjuration.¹ But similar formulae can be cited from prayers in official use among the Jews: the twelfth Berakah of the Shemoneh Esreh, to mention but one example,² runs: “. . . May all they that do evil perish quickly, and may they all right soon be rooted out; and do Thou cripple and break in pieces and overthrow and bend the haughty, soon, with speed, in our days.”³ We are also reminded of the early Christian ἐν τάχει, Luke xviii. 8, Romans xvi. 20, Revelation i. 1, xxii. 6, and ταχύ (frequent in Revelation). The observation of L. Blau,⁴ that in Jewish texts of conjuration (as might be expected) echoes of the prayer-book are not wanting, receives new confirmation from this little touch.

The interpreter has yet another question to answer. Why is the text repeated in duplicate on the Bucharest stone? We must conjecture that the prayer was to be made more insistent by this means. Repetition makes an incantation “more powerful,”⁵ so we may suppose the same to hold good here.

The question as to the age of our text was answered by Le Bas, the first editor, on the supposition that he was dealing with a Christian epitaph. From its similarity to certain cursing formulae in Christian epitaphs, or at the end of Christian manuscripts, or in the ritual of the Church, he felt obliged to conclude, although the shape of the letters did not seem to suit the assumption, that the inscription belonged to the 11th or 12th century A.D.! A reflecting reader of his investigations might easily, without recourse to other works, have observed two things. The characteristic Christian phrases in the late cursing formulae quoted by Le Bas were wanting in the text of the inscription, and the actual resemblances between the inscription and the late formulae occurred only in the gaps of the text which Le Bas had filled up conjecturally.¹ It was therefore quite right of Wilhelm not to beg the question by assuming the Christian origin of the text, but to start from the form of the letters and the outward appearance of the stone. He arrived at the result that the writing was that of the second century B.C.! This great difference in the opinions of two epigraphists might well make us diffident, were it not that between 1836 and 1901 there lies more than half a century of epigraphical research, which brought an enormous increase of data and steady progress in method. The history of the exposition of our texts is the history of that progress. In 1874 Otto Hirschfeld² declared that "to judge from the writing" the Bucharest text (the chronology of which does not differ from that of the Athenian) could scarcely be later than the second century A.D. In 1900 W. Dittenberger³ from the style of the writing placed it in the first century A.D. Wilhelm has now set the date of the Athenian text still further back, and three specialists, after inspecting the stone, have corroborated his opinion. At his request, Th. Homolle, P. Wolters, and Baron F. Hiller von Gaertringen examined the writing, without regard to the subject-matter, and assigned it to the second century B.C., "without of course excluding the possibility that it was written in the early decades of the following century, but in any case before the pillage in the year 88 B.C. and the fall of Delos."⁴

² The later prayer-books furnish many instances; cf. “swiftly and in our days” in the prayer already quoted from the Dicke Thephilla.

In this judgment we may have full confidence. The probability of a Christian origin has been already disproved by interpretative criticism. The simplicity of the texts bespeaks a high antiquity; the intricate confusion of the later incantations is altogether wanting in these formulae. The contents afford not the smallest inducement to dispute the date established by the specialists in epigraphy. The prayers are Jewish inscriptions of the end of the second or beginning of the first century B.C.

What is the importance of this fact? Jewish inscriptions of the pre-Christian period are very rare, and merely on that account every increase of material is of interest. But even in details the texts yield a respectable harvest. They afford confirmatory proofs of the existence of a Jewish community at Delos in the time of the successors of Alexander¹; they moreover render it probable that the Jews of Delos also buried their dead at Rheneia. That must have been in compulsory conformity with the customs of the place. But the name Heraclea, the ending of the name Marthina, the shape of the gravestones, the symbol of the two hands on the stones, and notably the whole style of the prayer²—these are all adaptations to the Hellenic surroundings. Hellenism is already at work on the great task of peacefully secularising the Jewish faith, and this at a time when in the old home of that faith men were still living who had witnessed the great days when the Maccabean martyrs poured out their blood for the law of their fathers.

This Hellenisation from outside was assisted from another direction by the Hellenisation of the Bible which originated with the cosmopolitan Jews of Alexandria. The Septuagint was already in use among the Jews of the Diaspora when the inscriptions at Rheneia were composed. This is a very important fact. Our inscriptions add to the literary evidence³ of the existence and use of the Septuagint in early times an original document that is only a few decades later than the celebrated testimony of the prologue to Ecclesiasticus. In this respect they are more valuable than the tablet of Hadrumetum.

They show further that the great Day of Atonement was actually celebrated by the Jews of Delos in the period about 100 B.C. We are not particularly well informed about worship in the Diaspora, and we therefore welcome the evidence that our stones give as to the celebration of the Feast of Feasts one hundred and fifty years before the time when the apostle Paul sailed in an Alexandrian ship on Cretan waters, shortly after *the Fast*¹ (i.e. the Day of Atonement).

Finally the inscriptions from Rheneia afford us a glimpse of the inner life of the Jewish community at Delos. Two girls, Heraclea and Marthina, have been murdered; the murderers, to whose guile or magic the poor things have fallen victims, are unknown. The blood of the innocent cries aloud to Heaven, for it is written, "Whoso sheddeth man's blood, by man shall his blood be shed." So vengeance is left to Him who visits the sins of the fathers upon the children. On the most solemn festival of the year, when all Israel afflict themselves and the prayers of the scattered children of Abraham rise everywhere on the four winds of heaven to the throne of the Eternal, whilst at Jerusalem the high priest enters the "Holy of Holies,"—the mourners bring their grim petition before God; in fervent prayer on the Day of Atonement they consign the murderers to the vengeance of the Omniscient and His angels:—

"I call upon and pray the Most High God, the Lord of the spirits and of all flesh, against those who with guile murdered or poisoned the wretched, untimely lost Heraclea, shedding her innocent blood wickedly: that it may be so with them that murdered or poisoned her, and with their children; O Lord that seeth all things, and ye angels of God, Thou before whom every soul is afflicted this same day with supplication: that Thou mayst avenge the innocent blood and require it again right speedily!"

And the same prayer is recited for Marthina, and immortalised in marble above the graves of the murdered maidens yonder in the island of the dead; daily shall the words of the prayer, dumb lines on the marble to the passer-by, but loud groans to the living God, tell of the unexpiated blood of Heraclea and Marthina; and even the Greek, to whom the formulae of the prayer seem strange, observes the uplifted hands, and perceives with a shudder the meaning of the writing on the Jewish graves.

APPENDIX II

ON THE TEXT OF THE SECOND LOGIA FRAGMENT FROM OXYRHYNCHUS

(*First published in the Supplement to the Allgemeine Zeitung [Munich]
No. 162, 18 July, 1904, and now adapted.*)

THE fourth volume of the Oxyrhynchus Papyri¹ offers, in addition to other theological texts, a new fragment with sayings of Jesus, which is assigned to the third century.

The most important task in connexion with the venerable document is the reconstruction of the text. Although more easy to read for a non-expert than the first fragment with sayings of Jesus from Oxyrhynchus, published in 1897, the new papyrus presents harder riddles, because the number of missing letters, and in consequence the number of possible restorations, is far greater. Altogether there are five or perhaps six longer or shorter sayings, which are said to be by Jesus. It is a fortunate circumstance that one of them was already known as an Agraphon (from the Gospel according to the Hebrews as quoted by Clement of Alexandria). Thus the approximate number of letters to be restored was ascertained, and this part² of the fragment could be completed with tolerable certainty:—

ήσεται.

¹ The Oxyrhynchus Papyri, Part IV., edited with translations and notes by Bernard P. Grenfell and Arthur S. Hunt, London, 1904, No. 654, p. 1 ff.

² I pass over the first lines; they contain a "Saying of Jesus" that is by no means so interesting as the rest.

Far less certain than this² is the restoration of the two following "Sayings." The editors read and conjecture as follows:—

II

λέγει Ἰ[ησ τίνες]

- 10 οἱ ἔλκοντες ἡμᾶς [εἰς τὴν βασιλείαν εἰ]

Know yourselves, and ye shall perceive that ye are sons of the Father of . . . Know yourselves . . . and ye are . . .

The whole restoration is ultimately dependent on the interpretation given to the word ἔλκοντες, which the editors understand in a good sense, and at the same time ethical sense, on the analogy of ἐλκύω in John vi. 44 and xii. 32. I must confess that this meaning was clear to me neither at first reading nor after considerable reflection, and that in the whole passage as restored by the editors I find much that to me seems unintelligible, extraordinary in itself and doubtful linguistically. My first impression of the word ἔλκοντες was that its meaning is the same as in James ii. 6, etc., "to drag," "to hale." I thus agree as regards the sense rather with Bartlet, who proposed another restoration to the editors, taking ἔλκω in the sense of "to persecute."¹ But I cannot bring myself to adopt Bartlet's restoration. With the same reservation that I expressed in restoring the supposed Gospel-Fragment from Cairo² (a reservation that will seem perfectly natural to every one conversant with the subject), I venture to submit the following attempted restoration, which is to be judged, of course, not by the details (which are capable of manifold and obvious variations), but by the idea underlying it. The parallels of words and subjects, which furnish at least hypothetical justification for my attempt, are noted below.

 καὶ ὑμεῖς ἐστε, ἣ πτορ[εῖσθε.³]

Jesus saith : How say they that draw us before the judgment seats that the Kingdom is in Heaven ? Can the fowls of the air know what is under the earth ? and the fishes of the sea what is in the heaven ? So are they that draw you. And the Kingdom nevertheless is within you. And whosoever knoweth your inward parts shall find it. . . . Know yourselves in the sight of God, and ye are sons of your Father which is perfect in Heaven. Know yourselves in the sight of men, and ye are there where ye are terrified.

I regard the whole as being spoken to the apostles in the same tone as the well-known words at the sending forth. As a mocking objection to the message of the apostles, "The Kingdom is at hand," a sentence like "The Kingdom is in Heaven" is well conceivable in the mouth of opponents. The comparison with the birds and fishes illustrates the opponents' want of apprehension.

The next "Saying" may be restored more simply and, in my opinion, with much greater certainty as regards the underlying principle. The editors print it thus :—

Jesus saith : A man . . . will not delay to ask . . . concerning his place in the Kingdom. . . . [Know ye] that many that are first shall be last, and the last first, and shall have eternal life.

Here too I feel bound to take quite another course ; Luke xiv. 7 ff. gives me the hint :—

[λέγει Ἰησ.]
οὐκ ἀποκνήσει ἄνθρωπος κληθεὶς σῶφρων ἐπερωτῆσαι πᾶν τῶν κλητό-ρων¹ περὶ τοῦ τόπου τῇ[ς] δοχῆς ποῦ ἀνακλιθῇ-25 σεται.² ὅτι πολλοὶ ἔσονται π[ρῶτοι ἔσχατοι καὶ] οἱ ἔσχατοι πρῶτοι καὶ [δόξαν³ εὐρήσου-] σιν.

Jesus saith : A man that is bidden will not delay, if he is prudent, by all means to ask one of them that did the bidding, concerning his place at the feast, where he shall sit. For many that are first shall be last, and the last first, and shall find worship.

Thus we have a variation of the words concerning those who chose out the chief rooms, and in this (new) context the saying about the first and the last ! The restoration that I have made in line 26 f., [εὐρήσου]σιν, is of course quite uncertain. I may refer, however, to an observation that, so far as I know, has not yet been made. In the Logia of 1897 there was frequent mention of “finding,” as now also in the two new “Sayings” I. and II. The same applies to “seeing” (and its synonyms). Is it possible that we have here a hint of the method on which these collections of apophthegms were arranged ?

“Saying” No. IV. is an interesting variant and enlargement of Matthew x. 26 and its parallels. Here too the last word has yet to be spoken concerning the text, but for the present I have no independent proposals to make. “Saying” No. V. is so greatly mutilated that the combined work of many students is necessary, before attempts at reconstruction can be made.

THE SUPPOSED FRAGMENT OF A GOSPEL AT CAIRO

(Reprinted with slight alterations from the Archiv für Religionswissenschaft, 7, pp. 387-392.)

IN the Catalogue général des antiquités égyptiennes du Musée du Caire, Vol. X. (Nos. 10001-10869 Greek Papyri), Oxford, 1903, B. P. Grenfell and A. S. Hunt publish a papyrus fragment (No. 10735) with the following text written in a small uncial hand of the 6th or 7th century. I print it with the editors' restorations.

The editors see in the sheet the remains of a book "containing apparently an uncanonical gospel. The verso (10 incomplete lines) is concerned with the Annunciation (?); the recto (9 incomplete lines) with the flight to Egypt."

Regarding the opinion here expressed, that the fragment before us is part of an uncanonical gospel, certain doubts suggest themselves.

In the first place the order in which the two pages stand is against it. If the fragment is a leaf from a book containing a gospel, it was no doubt one of the first leaves in the book, as we may conclude from the contents (flight to Egypt and annunciation of the birth of the Baptist to Mary); and in that case it would belong to that half of the first quire in which verso follows recto.¹ We should thus have a gospel in which the annunciation of the birth [of Jesus and] the Baptist to Mary followed after the flight into Egypt, and that is very improbable.

Then the contents of the text, so far as they can be made out, are not reconcilable with the assumption of Grenfell and Hunt. If the fragment is part of a gospel, then the recto-text requires us, after the words of the angel to Joseph, "Flee into Egypt," to reconstruct lines in which there is mention of a "gift," "his friends," and a "king." Though we might imagine Herod as the king, the other two legible fragments of lines hardly suit the context in a narrative of the flight into Egypt. The verso-text, on the other hand, requires after the words of the angel Gabriel announcing the birth of the Baptist to Mary, a sentence or sentences with the words archistra[tegos],² "servant," "arrival." These also are elements which one would hardly expect to find in this place in a gospel.

The doubts vanish if we assume that the fragment contains some kind of reflections on the flight into Egypt and the words of Gabriel, reflections either of an exegetical or edifying nature, and that instead of coming from a gospel it comes from a commentary or a book of sermons.

On this supposition the verso-text may really be in great part recovered. The problem of finding a text logically coherent with the words of the angel and containing the above-named elements became easier when προβαδὺ was recognised as the remains of some part of the verb προβαδίζω; after words referring to the conception of the Baptist it was quite appropriate to find a sentence describing John as the "servant" who "goeth before" the "coming" of the Master. Then when I had found that in Byzantine writers the archangels Michael and Gabriel are sometimes called by the name of ἀρχιστράτηγος,¹ which presumably goes back to LXX Joshua v. 14, the last doubtful word in this curious passage was brought into connexion with the rest, and it was possible to attempt restoration, provided that the approximate length of the lines was ascertainable.

The length of the lines, however, followed with some probability from lines 1 and 2 recto, which I thus completed² from Matthew ii. 13:—

αγγελος κῡ ἐλαλησεν· Ἰω[σηφ ἐγερθεις] παραλαβε Μαρναν την γυναικα σου κς] φευγε εις Αιγυπτου, etc.

The lines 4 and 5 verso also gave the length with reasonable probability, after I had thus restored them from Luke i. 36:—

[Ελισαβετ η συγ]γενης σου κς αυτη συν
 [ειληφε κς εκτο]ς εστι μην αυτη τη κα[λου]

There are thus about 30 letters to the line.

The consideration that led to the further experiment of restoring lines 6, 7, and 8 will appear from the little commentary below. I first give the text as restored and punctuated:—

² I had to remember that the abbreviation κς might be written instead of και (as in l. 6 recto and l. 4 verso). Ἰωσηφ I take as a vocative.

Line 3. The restoration is of course not certain ; there are other obvious possibilities.

Line 4. συγγενης in Luke i. 36 has the support of not a few authorities ; most read συγγενεις, cf. the apparatus criticus in Tischendorf.

Line 4 f. συνειληφεν in Luke i. 36 also has the support of several authorities (partly the same as those for συγγενης), the more general reading being συνειληφναι, cf. Tischendorf. The shorter word is to be conjectured on account of the limited number of the letters.

Line 5 f. The quotation¹ from Luke i. 36 must certainly have been abridged : there is no room for υιον εν γηρει αυτης, nor for ουτος.

Line 6 f. τω εκτω pretty certainly demands a preposition which governs the dative. The conjectural εν would, I think, fix the point of time thus : “ in the sixth month (reckoned backwards).” ο εστιν seems to be a sort of formula, “ that is to say ” ; the neuter is therefore not surprising. The name of some month is a very obvious thing to supply. When we know that the time of the Baptist’s conception was determined by Chrysostom (II. 362 BCD ed. Montfaucon) after laborious calculation to be September, we naturally think of this month, and I have inserted above its Egyptian name. But it is evident that the restoration of the two lines is uncertain.

Line 8 ff. From the supposed infinitive . . .]σειν and the accusative τον αρχιστρα[. . . I have argued the existence of a governing verb εδει. That οικετην refers to John, is an obvious deduction from the well-known saying of the Baptist about the “ shoe-latchet.” An excellent parallel, both real and verbal, to προβαδιζοντα,² etc., is the passage quoted by Boissonade in the Thesaurus Graecae Linguae, VI. 1647, from an unprinted sermon by Chrysostom,³ which calls John the Baptist τον του αλλου φωτος προβαδισαντα λυχνον.

Line 9. Instead of Ιωαννην we might have Γαβριηλ, and in line 10 instead of αυτου we might have ημων.

² The word seems to be rare and to belong to the lofty style ; so far it has been found only in Plutarch, Mor. II. p. 707 B, Greg. Naz. I. 1248 C (Migne), and the sermon by Chrysostom mentioned in the text.

There is little to be said with regard to the recto. What can still be completed has been shown above. Lines 6–8 may have contained a sentence like “And if God protecting looks down upon His friends, even the anger of a king is powerless.” The form of the quotation¹ from Matthew ii. 13 is remarkable; the Child is clearly not named, and instead of “His mother” we have “Mary thy wife.” I have found the name Mary in this context only in the Gospel of the Pseudo-Matthew xvii. 2, Tischendorf, p. 84: “tolle Mariam et infantem.”²

If the interpretation here given of the Cairo fragment is right in principle, it follows that we must be cautious in describing fragments with gospel words as “fragments of a gospel.”

I subjoin a translation of the restored verso-text:—

. . . let . . . interpret³ to thee. But the archistrategus saith unto the virgin: “Behold, Elizabeth thy kinswoman, she also hath conceived and the sixth month it is with her that was called barren.” In the sixth (month), therefore, that is in the month Thoth, did his mother conceive John. But it behoved the archistrategus to announce beforehand John, the servant who goeth before the coming of His Lord. . . .

It only remains now for somebody to identify the Cairo fragment. I have not succeeded in discovering from what book it comes. Should some one who is wider read succeed in identifying the fragment, and thus perhaps put a speedy end to my restorations, I should be the first to remember that, as St. Paul says, “we know in part.”

APPENDIX IV

A JEWISH INSCRIPTION IN THE THEATRE AT MILETUS

On the 17th April, 1906, Theodor Wiegand showed us a number of inscriptions on the seats of the theatre of Miletus, which dates from the Roman period. Among them was the following Jewish inscription in the fifth row from below in the second block (κερκίς) from the west. It is 4 feet broad, and with its letters $1\frac{1}{4}$ to $2\frac{1}{2}$ inches in height partly reminds one of the Jewish inscription from Corinth.¹ I give it here in facsimile (Figure 67) from a squeeze kindly made for me in 1907 by August Frickenhaus at the instance of Wiegand.

The inscription, doubtless of Imperial age, runs thus:—

Τόπος Ειουδέων² τῶν καὶ Θεοσεβίων.³

Place of the Jews, who are also called God-fearing.

Of Jews at Miletus nothing was previously known except a letter from the proconsul of Asia to the authorities of this town, saying that the Jews are not to be prevented from keeping their Sabbaths, practising their religious customs, and managing their revenues after their own manner.⁴ Our inscription is an original document proving the existence of the Jewish colony at Miletus. St. Paul perhaps, when he stayed at Miletus,⁵ came into some sort of contact with the Jews living there.⁶

⁵ Acts xx. 15, 17; and 2 Tim. iv. 20.

⁶ It is probable that, wherever there were Jews, Paul first sought to open communications with them.

FIG. 67.—Inscription for the Jewish Seats in the Theatre at Miletus. Imperial Period. By permission of Theodor Wiegand.

Very remarkable is the form of the name "God-fearing."¹ The form "they that fear God"² is very well known, from the Acts of the Apostles and other sources³; it denotes pagans who were in close touch with the Jewish worship, if not officially connected as proselytes. In the Milesian inscription the Jews themselves are similarly styled Θεοσέβιοι and the word must have already been felt to be a proper name.⁴ So far as I know it occurs elsewhere only as a proper name. As I read the actual inscription there at Miletus I wondered that it did not run "Place of the Jews and of those who are called God-fearing." But there can be no doubt that "God-fearing" is here an appellation of the Jews.⁵ The imperfect execution of the inscription allows us, perhaps, to suppose that the Milesian Jewish community, like that of Corinth,⁶ was not very wealthy.

The inscription is important in social history chiefly as showing that the Milesian Jews did not share the antipathy of their strict co-religionists to the theatre, of which there are frequent signs elsewhere.⁷ The process of Hellenisation or secularisation that we have frequently observed in Jewish inscriptions⁸ is reflected also in this one, put up in a pagan theatre by worshippers of the One God, or put up for them by the theatre authorities. We are reminded of the Jew Philo of Alexandria, who relates⁹ that he was once present at a performance of a tragedy by Euripides.

APPENDIX V

THE SO-CALLED "PLANETARY INSCRIPTION" IN THE THEATRE AT MILETUS A LATE CHRISTIAN PROTECTIVE CHARM

IN the north-west corner of the same theatre which has given us the new inscription described in Appendix IV. there is on the outer wall an inscription which has long been known and which has often been discussed under the name of the "planetary inscription" of Miletus. I knew of it from the Corpus Inscriptionum Graecarum (No. 2895), and had no doubt met with it occasionally in commentaries on the New Testament, there quoted in proof of the worship of angels¹ in Asia Minor in the time of St. Paul (Colossians ii. 18). When it was shown to us in situ by Theodor Wiegand on 17 April, 1906, in the brilliant light of an Ionian sun, I immediately perceived a strong contrast between its real appearance and the picture left upon my memory by the Corpus of Inscriptions. There was quite a late look about the inscription, and its "mistakes" in form reminded me of the early Byzantine papyri.

My impression was confirmed by Wiegand's opinion of the style of the characters, and especially by his accurate reconstruction of the architectural history of the theatre.² Wiegand's

My readers are indebted to Wiegand for the good facsimile—the first, I believe, to be made from a photograph—here given in Figure 68. The dimensions⁴ are as follows: present breadth 41 inches, height 24 inches, height of the largest letters 1 inch, height of the smallest letters $\frac{1}{2}$ inch. The peculiar arrangement of the inscription is clearly seen from the figure. It begins with a line consisting of symbols; originally no doubt there were seven, but they are now reduced to five. Then comes a line carved in large letters; it will be seen from the figure to what extent they are separated⁵ :—

It consists, then, of a row of vowels, seemingly without recognisable principle of permutation,⁶ but perhaps to be thus divided :—

Ιεουαηω ΙαωΑΙ Εουαηωι Ωαηουι Αωιηεου εν ον[όματι]⁷ + about 9 letters],

Ιεουαηωι ΑωΑ Ιεουαηωι, etc.

Under the row of vowels there were originally no doubt seven ovals, of which five and a half now remain. The outlines are rudely drawn and the spacing is irregular, but each oval is placed exactly below the foot of the corresponding symbol in the uppermost line. Each contains an inscription in smaller characters, and each inscription begins with the series of seven vowels arranged in exact alphabetical permutation (αεηιουω, εηιουωα etc.), and ends with the prayer :—

|----------------------|---------------------|
| ἄγιε, | O Holy One, |
| φύλαξον ¹ | keep |
| τὴν πόλιν | the city |
| Μιλησίων | of the Milesians |
| καὶ πάντας | and all |
| τοὺς κατοι- | that dwell therein. |
| κοῦντας. | |

At the bottom of all is the following, again in the large letters of the first line :—

Ἀρχάγγελοι, φυλάσσεται² ἡ πόλις Μιλησίων καὶ πάντες οἱ
κατ[οικοῦντες.]

Boeckh in the Corpus began his commentary with the remark that no doubt the inscription originally had seven compartments for the seven “planets.” Since then the name “planetary inscription” has been regularly employed, although Boeckh’s assertion was a pure petitio principii. And although Boeckh himself showed that the symbols placed over the compartments were by no means the stereotyped ones for the planets, the descriptions always say that the inscription begins with the “planetary symbols.” In order to be sure on this point I submitted the symbols to Franz Boll, who is our best authority on ancient astrology, and received from him the assurance that they are not planetary symbols, or at least that up to the present he had never met with any certain example of their use as such.³

³ Letter, Würzburg, 19 October, 1907. Out of the stores of his learning Boll provided me with abundant data relating to ancient symbols which I unfortunately cannot utilise here.—It seemed to me when I was in Galilee, in April 1909, that some of the ancient magical symbols are still in use among the modern Arab population as tattoo marks.

In interpreting the inscription, therefore, we must not begin with the uncertainties—"planetary symbols" which are really nothing of the kind; we must begin with the certainties, which are the word "archangels"¹ and the series of vowels. Are there any other cases known where the archangels occur in combination with series of vowels?

This question must be answered in the affirmative. Papyrus No. 124 in the British Museum,² written in the 4th or 5th century A.D., gives a powerful formula consisting of four parallel columns, each containing seven magic names. In columns 1 and 3 the following series of vowels and names of archangels are found exactly corresponding with one another:—

|---|---------|-----------------------|
| 1 | αηιουω | Μιχαηλ |
| 2 | ειουωα | Ραφαηλ |
| 3 | ηιουωαε | Γαβριηλ |
| 4 | ιουωαεη | Σουριηλ ³ |
| 5 | ουωαεηι | Ζαζιηλ |
| 6 | υωαεηιο | Βαδακιηλ ⁴ |
| 7 | ωαεηιου | Συλιηλ |

These series of vowels in the Egyptian papyrus are, however, down to the last letter, exactly the same as those carved in regular alphabetic succession on the marble at Miletus in the several (originally seven) compartments. On this account, and more especially since the bottom line of large letters expressly addresses the archangels, we must interpret the symbols over each of the seven compartments as symbols of the archangels. Since the names of the seven archangels vary⁵ and they do

¹ I am well aware that elsewhere the archangels are frequently brought into connexion with the planets by the ancients, but that is no reason for identifying archangels and planets without special grounds.

not always occur in a stereotyped order, we are not bound to assign the seven compartments of the Milesian inscription precisely to the seven angels mentioned in the papyrus. The only thing necessary is that in the symbols above the several compartments, which have been hitherto regarded as planetary symbols, we should look for monograms or tokens of the seven archangels. Experts in Byzantine monograms and masons' ligatures will do well to take account also of the symbols and ligatures employed in astrological texts,¹ magical papyri,² and Christian inscriptions³ of other periods. We may in any case expect the most popular of the archangels, Michael, Raphael, and Gabriel; Michael, as the most powerful, would perhaps be in the middle,⁴ Raphael and Gabriel perhaps at the beginning,⁵ and in the fifth place perhaps (as in the papyrus) Zaziel or Zadakiel.⁶ The distribution of the single names is, however, for the present not at all certain, and remains of secondary importance.

Further confirmation, importing a new factor into the discussion, is afforded by a Vienna magical papyrus of the 4th century A.D. published by Wessely.⁷ It consists of two columns; in the left-hand column is the magic word $\alpha\beta\lambda\alpha\nu\alpha\theta\alpha\nu\alpha\lambda\beta\alpha$, written out so that the letters form a triangle

with the apex downwards¹; in the right-hand column and at the bottom of the left column, a large number of angelic² and Divine names promiscuously. The end runs thus:—

|-------------------------------|------------------------------------|
| Μιχαήλ, Αδηνι Οουσουρ, | Michael, Adeni Usur, |
| Γαβριήλ, Σουριήλ, Ραφαήλ, | Gabriel, Suriel, Raphael |
| φύλαξον Σοφία(sic) ἣν ἔτεκεν | keep Sophia, whom |
| Θεα[. . . ?] ἀπὸ παντὸς . . . | Thea(. . . ?) bore, from all . . . |

Here we have still more clearly the plan of the Milesian formula:—

- (1) magic letters,
- (2) invocation of the archangels,
- (3) the prayer “keep . . .”

Those who attach importance to chance circumstances may insist on the incorrect nominative Σοφία, which corresponds to the incorrect nominative in the last line of the Milesian inscription.

Thus the inscription at Miletus would seem to be a prayer made more powerful by the use of magic symbols, and addressed to the seven archangels, for the preservation of the city and its inhabitants. First of all the angels are indicated severally by their secret symbols; then follows a great line of adjuration applying to them collectively; and the compartments (originally seven in number) contain the adjuration, strengthened by the magic vowels, addressed to each of the Holy Ones in turn:—

“O Holy One, keep the city of Miletus, and all that dwell therein.”

Last of all comes the prayer to them collectively:—

“Archangels, keep the city of Miletus, and all that dwell therein.”

The question whether this inscription is pagan, Jewish, or Christian has a different meaning, according as we are thinking of the contents, or of the men who had it carved on the wall of the theatre at Miletus. The contents do not in the least point to paganism, and all the externals are against its having originated in pagan times. In itself the inscription might be Jewish: the archangels are Jewish, although not primitive Jewish, and in ancient Miletus, where we even encounter St. Paul at a solemn hour in his life,¹ there certainly were Jews.²

Moreover, as regards contents, the prayer has been influenced by the Septuagint.³ Yet the prominent position of the inscription and its repetition in another place make it very improbable that the text was set up by the doubtless small Jewish minority or even by a single Jew. What sounds Jewish in the contents of the prayer has long become Christian by inheritance and adoption. Prayer "for the city" particularly was an invariable concomitant of Christian worship in Anatolia even in early times,⁴ and must therefore have been something quite familiar. Furthermore, the worship of the archangels, especially of Michael, was extremely popular in early Christian Asia Minor.⁵ Theodor Wiegand, the explorer of ancient Miletus, found some years ago between Didyma and Miletus an early Byzantine basilica, in which an inscription was discovered, built into the mosaic of the narthex, and containing an invocation of an archangel.⁶ To this day throughout Greek Christendom innumerable evening prayers are uttered to the guardian angel: "O holy angel of God, . . . keep me from every assault of the Adversary."⁷

In all probability, therefore, we have here before us a Christian memorial of the period when the theatre was converted into a citadel. Not indeed an official manifesto of the clergy of

³ Psalm cxxvi. [cxxvii.] 1, ἐὰν μὴ κύριος φυλάξῃ πόλιν, εἰς μάτην ἡγρύπνησεν ὁ φυλάσσων, "except the Lord keep the city, the watchman waketh but in vain." Again, πάντες οἱ κατοικοῦντες is a common Septuagint formula, the fixity of which perhaps helped to occasion the error in the last line of the inscription.

Miletus; they would surely not have employed magic symbols thus publicly. It is more likely to have been a private venture, perhaps the work of the guardsmen of the Christian stronghold that was built on the secure and massive foundation of the ancient masonry. The prayer on the stone imploring the princes of the heavenly host to protect the city from all the dangers to which it was exposed in a troublous age seemed to the faith of the soldiers more efficacious in the form of a protective charm.

In the reign of Justinian an imperial official named Bictorinus caused two very similar prayers for protection to be carved on stone at Corinth or in the Isthmus, addressed to Christ and the Virgin Mary. There are no magic lines, but there are similar formulae and similar mistakes.¹ These prayers seem to me to be an additional confirmation of the Christian nature of the Milesian inscription. They may even throw light on the exact date of its origin, which will no doubt be more closely determinable as the study of late inscriptions advances. The influence of the Christian liturgy on these Corinthian prayers is likewise unmistakable.²

² Cf. for example the Liturgy of St. Chrysostom (Swainson, p. 92), μνήσθητι, κύριε, τῆς πόλεως ἐν ᾗ παροικοῦμεν καὶ πάσης πόλεως καὶ χώρας καὶ τῶν πίστει κατοικούντων ἐν αὐταῖς, “Remember, O Lord, the city in which we dwell and every city and district, and them that dwell in them in the faith.”

UNRECOGNISED BIBLICAL QUOTATIONS IN SYRIAN AND MESOPOTAMIAN INSCRIPTIONS

(Reprinted with slight alterations from Philologus 64 [1905] pp. 475-478.)

IN the Byzantinische Zeitschrift 14 (1905) pp. 1-72, Baron Max von Oppenheim and Hans Lucas published "Greek and Latin Inscriptions from Syria, Mesopotamia, and Asia Minor."¹ The majority of the Greek inscriptions are of Christian origin, and, as most of them are dated, they are particularly valuable, especially for the palaeography and textual history of the Greek Bible.² The importance of inscriptional evidence as to the text of the Bible in general has not yet been sufficiently recognised, but any one familiar with the present position of the problems relating to the recensions by Lucianus and Hesychius will welcome every Greek Biblical quotation that can be certainly located and dated. The above-mentioned inscriptions contain a comparatively large number of Biblical references, and almost all of them can be located and dated. So far as they originate from places in Syria, they arouse our interest on account of the text of Lucianus, the sphere of whose influence is to be looked for especially in those regions. Hans Lucas, the editor of the inscriptions, of course recognised most of the quotations; in the following pages we shall only bring forward a few inscriptions in which he either failed to see, or perhaps intentionally left unnoticed, the Biblical quotations. I content myself with merely pointing them out, without addressing myself to the Lucianus problem or the general question of the relationships of the text. The numbers are those used by Lucas; the names denote the places where the inscriptions were found; the illustrations referred to for comparison are in Lucas.

No. 15. 'Alī Kāsūn, 394 A.D., πάντα ἐκ θεοῦ comes from 2 Corinthians v. 18.

No. 21. Tamak, 559 A.D., thus read by Lucas:—

and transcribed:—

is a quotation from LXX Psalm lxxix. [lxxx.] 2:—

No. 23. Kaşr Nawā, undated, facsimile figure 4, is thus read by Lucas:—

The editor remarks: "The contents were probably of a religious nature, but my attempts at restoration have not succeeded. One is much reminded of the Song of Solomon, cf. vi. 3: Καλὴ εἰ πλησίον μου, ὥς εὐδοκία, ὥραία ὥς Ἱερουσαλήμ (cf. also verses 5, 6). Von Wilamowitz reminds me that ΔΔΔ in line 4 might signify Δαβείδ." It is a pity that this right clue was not followed up. The inscription is in fact made up of words taken from the Song of Solomon, viz. from chapter iv.; but only a selection, not the full text, is given. This makes it much more difficult to reconstruct the lines correctly. The following restoration on the basis of LXX Song of Solomon iv. 1, 3, 4, 7, makes no claim to have recovered the original arrangement of the lines; it merely tries to hinge the endings of the lines together:—

[μου. ὀφθαλμοί σου περιστεραί. (3) ὥς σπαρ]τίον
[τὸ κόκκινον χεῖλη σου, καὶ ἡ λαλιά σου] ὠραία. ὥς

[μῶμος οὐκ ἔστιν ἐ]ν σοί. †

With regard to $\overline{\Delta A \Delta} = \Delta \alpha \nu \epsilon \iota \delta$ it is to be noted that the mark of abbreviation seems to be recognisable in the facsimile.

No. 24. Ḳaṣr Nawā, undated, facsimile figure 5, is read by Lucas:—

and transcribed:—

Εἰσελε[ύσ..... ἐξο-

It is added that "the contents are at all events of a religious nature"; the editor is reminded of passages such as LXX Psalm xlii. [xliii.] 4 and Revelation iii. 5. The inscription is, however, a quotation from LXX Psalm xcix. (c.) 4:—

Εἰσέλθ[ατε εἰς τὰς πύλας αὐτοῦ ἐν ἐξο-] μολογή[σει, τὰς αὐλὰς αὐτοῦ ἐν ὕμνοις·] ἐξομο[λογείσθε αὐτῷ, αἰνεῖτε τὸ ὄνο-] μα αὐτ[οῦ·

It is very improbable that there was εἰς before τὰς in line 2 (as there is in Codices Σ A R T etc.).

No. 25. ẖaṣr Nawā, undated, is read by Lucas :—

No. 39. ẖaṣr el Berūdī, undated, Ἐμανουήλ μεθ' ἡμῶν ὁ θε[ός]. Cf. Matthew i. 23. For the spelling Ἐμανουήλ see Onomastica Sacra, ed. Lagarde,² 49₃₀ Cod. F.

No. 49. ẖaṣr ibn Wardān, 564 A.D., πάντα εἰς δόξαν θ(εο)ῦ. Quotation from 1 Corinthians x. 31.

No. 99. Diārbekr, 437 (?) A.D., ὦ[ν] τὰ ὀνόμ(ατα) ἐν β(ί)β(λ)ῳ [this, and not βιβλίῳ, would be the proper extension] ζω(ῆς). Quotation from Philippians iv. 3.

Apart from their importance as witnesses to the text, Biblical quotations in inscriptions are always full of interest for the history of devotion. They show what books of Holy Scripture were the favourites, and what were the really popular texts. Not infrequently they enable us to see how they were interpreted. But none of this has yet been worked out; people still prefer to cite the Biblical quotations in the Fathers from bad editions of their works. Let us hope that in the Corpus of Christian Inscriptions to which we look forward the Biblical material will be treated in a manner satisfactory alike to the demands of epigraphy and of modern Biblical philology.
